At this point, however, he receives a letter from his mother, the widowed Empress Helena, residing in Bithynia, who, while congratulating him on having renounced the worship of idols, implores him to adopt, not Christianity, but the only true religion, Judaism. Hereupon a disputation is held as to the merits of the two religions, between the Pope on one side and twelve Rabbis on the other. After argument is exhausted, recourse is had to the test of miracles. A bull is brought in, and the Rabbi who champions the faith of Moses whispers in its ear the mysterious Name revealed on Sinai. The bull falls dead, and all the bystanders feel that the Jew has triumphed; but then Sylvester draws near and whispers in the creature's ear the name of Christ, whereupon the bull comes to life again and stands upright on its feet. Then the Christian cause is admitted to have triumphed.

This fiction of the baptism of Constantine at Rome became in the eighth century the starting-point for the Donation. This professes to be a charter or deed of gift by the Emperor to Sylvester. After reciting the story of his leprosy and miraculous cure, Constantine proceeds to grant to the bishop and clergy of Rome a number of high dignities and ornaments of imperial rank, and finally declares that he hands over and relinquishes to Sylvester and his successors "our palace, the city of Rome, and all the provinces, places, and cities of Italy and the western regions," to remain for ever "under the authority of the Holy Roman Church." The origin of so amazing a document remains a matter of conjecture. Dr. Hodgkin charitably suggests that it may have been not a deliberate forgery, but a romantic jeu d'esprit composed by some clerk in the papal chancery, subsequently discovered among the archives, and in an uncritical age honestly taken for genuine. The suggestion would be more plausible if the Donation were more unparalleled. In any case the Donation became for the ambitious popes of the eleventh century the basis of astonishing "pretensions to rule as feudal suzerains over Italy, over the Holy Roman Empire, over the world." At the Renaissance its authority was finally destroyed by the critical Declamatio of Laurentius Valla, and to-day even Catholic controversialists are shy of referring to it.

Dr. Hodgkin devotes much pains to an elaborate picture of the court of Charlemagne at Aix-le-Chapelle, the record of which is a brilliant literary oasis in the midst of the Dark Ages. Charlemagne, for all the touches of the barbarian in him, was full of enthusiasm for scholarship. He prayed in Latin, and understood, though he could not speak, Greek. At dinner he was accustomed to have the "City of God," or some other work of his favourite St. Augustine, read aloud. In his wakeful nights he tried to teach himself to write, but never quite succeeded. He began to write a Frankish grammar and made a collection of national songs which would have been invaluable to the modern scholar, had not his successor, Louis the Pious, failed to preserve it. "Truly," says Dr. Hodgkin, "we at this day find it harder to forgive the débonnaire Louis for the loss of his father's ballad-book than even for the ruin of his father's empire." The great literary ornament of the court was the Englishman Alcuin, who became master of the palace schools, and whose letters to Charles and to various correspondents in his mother country were full of instruction and entertainment. There were also Paulus Diaconus, and Theodulf, and Peter of Pisa, all writers of some distinction, not to speak of Angilbert, abbot of St. Riquier, and irregular son-in-law of Charles, who seems to have been the laureate of the coterie, and is familiarly spoken of by Alcuin as "Homerus." One of his poems is a long description of Aix and its court, the great baths of Apollo Grannus, with a hundred men or more, the king among them, swimming about in the wide warm pools, the royal boar-huntings, the young princesses with their "flaxen, or yet paler than flaxen," hair.

The dress of Queen Liutgarda and of Charles's six daughters is minutely described, and if we could trust the poet's accuracy we should have here a valuable piece of evidence for the attire of Frankish dames of high station; but when we find that each of the ladies goes hunting with a gold coronet on her head, in which emeralds or chrysolites or jacinths are blazing, we are forced to suspect that the picture is conventional, and that each princess insisted upon being painted in the most gorgeous of her court costumes.

Theodulf also has his picture of the court—idealised, yet attractive; and he, too, lays stress on the pleasant quality of some at least of Charles's domestic relations:

The children crowd around their father in friendly rivalry of good offices. Charles takes from him his heavy double pallium and his gloves, Louis takes his sword. The daughters receive the loving kisses of their sire. Bertha brings roses, Hostrad violets, Gisila lilies, Rothaid apples, Hiltrud bread, Theoderada wine. All these maidens wear beautiful jewels—some red, some green, golden clasps, bracelets, and necklaces. One delights her father by her graceful dance, another by her merry jokes. Then draws near the king's sister, the holy Gisila. She kisses her brother, and her placid face shows as much joy as can co-exist with her joy in the heavenly Bridegroom. She begs Charles to explain to her some dark passage of Scripture, and he teaches her that which he has himself learned of God.

Dr. Hodgkin's chronicle extends over full five hundred years. It spans a debatable land of chaos—the interval between two great organisations of Europe, the Roman Empire and the Holy Roman Empire; it deals with the most fascinating of all studies—that of the beginnings of institutions, of civilisations in the germ.

Ships Past and Present.

The Ship: Her Story. By W. Clark Russell. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

Pen and Pencil Sketches of Shipping and Craft. By R. T. Pritchett. (Arnold. 10s. 6d. net.)

MR. CLARK RUSSELL disarms his critics with a suavity and thoroughness which we have rarely seen equalled: "My pages will not be accepted as a very learned or gravely important contribution to the literature of the Ship. They will be regarded as mere prattle, as we wander about the shipbuilding yard. We relate anecdotes; we crack our poor joke; we point to this and we point to that; we tell what we know and what we believe to be the truth, and if we are wrong we apologise." The critic, stripped of his weapons, can only remark that he could not have criticised the thing better. For although this book is worthy of Mr. Russell's life-long devotion to ships and their history, it is not a very informing or orderly work. It is suggestive, and picturesque; and you like Mr. Russell's breezy prejudices and comments. Moreover the book is illustrated with real art and knowledge by Mr. Seppings Wright.

Mr. Russell hastens down the ages to British ships. Here the reader will be struck with the backwardness of British shipbuilders. Down to the last century we had everything to learn from the Venetian and Genoese craftsmen. Yet our willingness to learn was small. "Abroad they were making a fine art of the industry while we were rendering our home waters hideous with grotesque and monstrous shapes." For centuries the English shibboleth was "beam." "There was so much beam that it ended in being nearly all bow, and sailors looking over a ship's head would growl that she could shove an empty bottle a mile along with her." The most maritime nation of Europe seems to have neglected every opportunity of discovering and adopting a fine type of ship. It is curious to compare the globular creations of the early shipwrights with the vessels of the Vikings, on which Mr. Russell writes with enthusiasm. Those who built them were men of exquisite skill in their craft. They went to the sea for ideas. They eyed the wheeling gull; they studied the motions of the fish. Clearly they produced out of themselves without reference to what had been done elsewhere. The remains of a plank-built boat were unearthed in Denmark about half a century since. She was supposed to have been as old as the fifth century; her measurement was seventy-seven feet from stem to stern. It does not appear that she borrowed help from canvas. The rowers dipped their oars in chase, and flashed the delicately-shaped structure through as fast as a gale of wind could drive her. Her sheer, her lines, are those of a clipper ship. The Yankees might have borrowed the hint of their beautiful Baltimore clippers from her.

Aft all poop, forward all forecandle, the ships of England were for long veritable tubs. We think of Raleigh's ships as handy vessels, far safer and swifter than the three-deckers of the Armada and the huge galleons they stripped on the high seas. Yet Raleigh's ship, the Repentance, which he renamed the Daintie at the behest of Elizabeth, was a ship which no harbour-master would now permit to leave an English port. Sir Walter tells how she nearly capsized at Gravesend through over-loading. In those days the lower ports of a ship were often brought nearly flush with the water owing to the weight of cargo and guns. The mere neglect to close these ports caused many a disaster. Raleigh's vessel, bowing to the wind, began to imbibe the Thames at an alarming rate. "But God was pleased that with a diligence and travail of the company she was freed of that danger, which may be a gentle warning to all such as take charge of shipping, even before they set sail in river or harbour, to have an eye to their ports."

Readers of Mr. Clark Russell's novels will not need to be told that his affections are given to the superb wooden sailing-ships which England began to build at the beginning of this century. The old East Indiamen, and the later tea-clippers in the China trade, have Mr. Russell's exulting praise. The tea-clippers sent afloat between 1860 and 1872 will never, Mr. Russell thinks, be excelled as ocean-going ships. Unfortunately Mr. Russell's happiness is as brief as the period. He does not like the iron sailing-ships which are now built. He does not like very big sailing-ships like the France, and for such monsters as the new Oceanic he has words of deprecation and warning. But he believes in the best—not the largest—type of steamships.

Mr. Pritchett's book is the complement of Mr. Russell's. It is a series of notes and drawings of ships and craft of all nations, and is retrospective only by accident. Mr. Pritchett is marine painter to the Royal Thames Yacht Club, and in the course of many voyages in the Wanderer and the Sunbeam he has observed shipping with a professional eye. Hence he can give us drawings of Dutch pinks and Burmese rice-boats, of Turkish caiques and Singapore kolehs. The interest of his book centres, however, in types nearer home. Like Mr. Russell, Mr. Pritchett has words of the warmest praise and regret for the superb sailing-ships which our mercantile marine boasted early in the reign of Queen Victoria. He tells how the China tea-clippers, when they received the new tea-crops, raced each other to London. They shook out their sails at Canton or Shanghai while the last cases of tea were coming on board, and after a race of twenty thousand miles through all climates and conditions they frequently arrived in the Thames within forty-eight hours of each other. The captain of the winning vessel is said to have received £500 as his reward. This grand type of sailing-ship disappeared with the opening of the Suez Canal and the advent of steam.

So quaint a vessel as the Dutch eel schuyt is familiar to Londoners. Three such vessels always lie off Billingsgate, and their peculiar build and confusion of eel baskets and other gear make them a delightful incident in the Pool. It is by maintaining never fewer than three of these vessels at this spot that the Dutch enjoy the privileges of a charter granted them four centuries ago. Not in all that time have the shape and rig of these schuyts altered, as anyone may see who compares them with Vandevelde's pictures in the National Gallery. The conservatism of the Dutch boatbuilders is remarkable. Thus the Scheveningen herring boats—Mesdag's boats—do not suffer change. Mr. Pritchett says:

Their dimensions, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, alter not. Length, 40 ft.; beam, 20 ft.; depth, 12 ft. Some years ago, when the builder at Scheveningen was asked if he always built to those dimensions, he said: "Yes, always. Would you believe, sir, that a man came to me wanting me to build him a junk 40 ft. by 19 ft.?" "19 ft.! No, sir, you are foppish; you must go," answered the builder.

This reply smacks of Dr. Johnson in his most robust mood of contradiction. The pinks are brought to shore with sail set, and allowed to ground themselves among the breakers. Then, when the tide goes down, the herring-boats and fish-wives cluster round, and Mesdag sets his easel. Mr. Pritchett's drawings are sketchy but informing, and his book is a thoroughly interesting product alike in its text and illustrations.

"The Man Behind the Scenes."

Memoirs and Correspondence of Lyon Playfair, First Lord Playfair of St. Andrews. By Wemyss Reid. (Cassell. 21s.)

It is a tribute to the abilities of the late Lord Playfair that while one section of the world hailed him as a good man gained, another section shook their heads over him as a good man lost. To the world of pure science, which saw in him an original investigator and thinker of great promise, his diversion into the field of politics and practical reform came as a disappointment; but to the successive governments which employed him on difficult and important Commissions his wide knowledge, tact, and unsparing capacity for work rendered him an invaluable adherent. The truth is, that Playfair inherited from his Scottish ancestry two sterling qualities of the race, either of which, but not both, he had the power of developing to its utmost extent: his taste for scientific research, and his talent for organisation and reform. As a youth he made one or two false starts, first in business and then in medicine; finally he took to chemistry, and, after studying for a time under Graham in London, became one of the most successful pupils and associates at Giessen of the great Liebig, whose work on agricultural chemistry he translated and published in England. Playfair, in his autobiographical memoir which forms the groundwork of this volume, records his astonishment at receiving an invitation from Peel, whom he did not know, to visit him at Drayton Manor, and was inclined to suspect a practical joke. Reassured upon this point, however, by Buckland, who was also invited, he went, and must have been still more astonished at being offered by the Prime Minister, on consideration of his staying in England, a written memorandum promising him the first vacancy for employment. The memorandum he wisely declined, but the employment followed soon, first in the shape of an investigation, with the great Bunsen, into the chemical reactions which take place inside a blast furnace, and shortly afterwards as one of the experts appointed on a Royal Commission to inquire into the sanitary state of large towns. At this date, 1844, the conditions of life, of sewerage, of ventilation, and of water supply in English towns was incredibly bad; and in Lancashire, the district chosen by Playfair, was almost worse than anywhere else. The Commission did their work with great thoroughness, and their reports remain to this day the chief authority on questions of sanitary legislation. As soon as the inquiry was at an end Playfair was offered, and accepted, the appointment of chemist to the Geological Survey, and began to devote himself to those agricultural considerations which were so much needed, as well as to various questions affecting the public health.

In his new capacity he drew up several valuable reports on questions as diverse as the sanitation of Buckingham Palace, the best coal to be used in the navy, and the failure of the potato crop which led to the great Irish famine. It was a period of disastrous accidents in coal-mines, and Playfair was called upon more than once at the risk of his life to report on outbreaks of firedamp. Generally speaking, however, his life was uneventful, until in 1850 his remarkable capacity for smoothing away difficulties led to his being appointed one of the organisers of the Great Exhibition. The whole scheme at this date was in danger of being wrecked by mutual jealousies within and fierce opposition outside the executive. Playfair's own appointment, which seemed to oust Sir Henry Cole from the chief place, was for the moment a fresh cause of trouble, but his tact saved the situation. The public has never known to what an extent the success of the Great Exhibition was due to his efforts, for he remained essentially "the man behind the scenes"; but the Queen and the Prince Consort were well aware of it, and the latter to the day of his death never failed to consult Playfair on any matter of emergency.

During the Crimean War Playfair came forward in a new capacity as an inventor of diabolical shells for poisoning the enemy or setting fire to their property. The invention was declined by the War Office on humanitarian grounds.

There is no sense [he scathingly writes] in this objection. It is considered a legitimate mode of warfare to fill shells with molten metal which scatters among the enemy and produces the most frightful modes of death. Why a poisonous vapour which would kill men without suffering is to be considered illegitimate warfare is incomprehensible. War is destruction, and the more destructive it can be made with the least suffering the sooner will be ended that barbarous method of protecting national rights.

In 1858, when he was in his fortieth year, Lyon Playfair applied for and obtained the professorship of chemistry at Edinburgh, then one of the most highly coveted posts of its class. He hoped to have leisure to resume his scientific researches, but once more he was doomed to disappointment. Royal Commissions upon the Cattle Plague, and the Herring Fisheries, and an International Exhibition in 1862, claimed his services, and in 1868 the extension of popular representation to the Scotch Universities singled him out for Parliament, in which he sat for a memorable seventeen years of his life as member for the Edinburgh University. He warmly espoused the cause of vaccination, and he was the author of the Bill for imposing legislative restrictions upon vivisection. He also championed the cause of margarine — “the poor man’s butter” — and secured the legalisation of its sale. In his old capacity as “the man behind the scenes” he was still invaluable, especially during the party differences which followed the resignation of Mr. Gladstone. His later years of active life were happily devoted to the unification of American and British interests, for which work he had a special fitness, having married an American wife, and being closely allied by ties of friendship with leading men in America. During the strained and anxious period of the Venezuelan dispute he was in continuous requisition as a go-between, and although Mr. Cleveland’s diplomatic manners made the task an especially difficult one, he was fortunate in seeing his efforts and the patience of the British Government crowned with success. He was created Lord Playfair on Mr. Gladstone’s re-accession in 1892, and died only last year, at the age of eighty.

The memoir is full of good things for which it is difficult to find space. The following instance, however, of the way in which he was constantly surprised to find himself famous in out-of-the-way places deserves to be given. He had gone with a friend, when on a visit to Canada, to inspect some mines of mineral phosphate at Lièvre :

The manager of these was a Scotchman, tall, big-boned, with the strongest Glasgow Doric in his tongue. At first he was obdurate, and desired us to leave the ground and to drop the specimens which we had taken before he appeared. At last I addressed him in good Scotch, and asked him whether he thought I was a mining adventurer. “Ay! that’s just what ye are.” “No,” I replied, “I am a Scotch professor.” “Then if ye are, ye’ll be havin’ a name.” “My name,” I said, “is Playfair.” “Man!” said my Scotch friend, “are ye Lyon Playfair?” I assured him I was, but expressed surprise that he knew the name, to which he replied, looking from his six feet two inches with compassion on my five feet four inches, “Hoot, man, yer name’s travelled further than yer wee legs will ever carry ye.”

Pleasant, too, and typical of his generosity, is the story of how an unknown correspondent once sent him a postal order for 17s. 6d. with the following letter of explanation : “You may not remember the circumstance, but many years ago I accosted you one night in the docks at Liverpool, and begged for assistance. You found you had no money, but you took off your coat and gave me your waistcoat. Since then I have made a fortune and I now repay you.”

Credit must be given to Sir Wemyss Reid for his careful arrangement of the scattered documents and facts in this Memoir, and his lucid passages of explanation. The autobiographical notes themselves would give an inadequate idea of Lord Playfair’s great services to the cause of applied science in England. What they lack in this respect Sir Wemyss Reid has admirably supplied.

The World-Wide Empire.

Under Queen and Khedive. By Sir Walter Miéville. (Heinemann. 6s.)

The Expansion of Egypt. By A. Silva White. (Methuen. 15s.)

Rulers of India: Bábar. By Stanley Lane Poole. (Oxford : University Press.)

The British Empire Series. I. India; II. Africa. (Kegan Paul.)

Founders of the Empire. By Philip Gibbs. (Cassell.)

SIR WALTER MIÉVILLE’S book, Under Queen and Khedive, is a purely personal narrative, describing Sir Walter’s work and life in Egypt first as a Consular official of the Queen, and afterwards as President of the Maritime and Quarantine Council under the Khedive. The fact that it is a personal account of the work of an Egyptian official gives it the touch of actuality which is not usually to be found in histories and semi-official compilations. Sir Walter Miéville was the man who fought the cholera in Egypt, and was so heartily abused by the reptile French press of Egypt for so doing. It is pleasant to have to add that the virulent attacks levelled at him by the enemies of England and Egypt had no effect on Lord Cromer and the Foreign Office, except perhaps to make them value Sir Walter’s services all the more. The cause of this excellent official’s retirement was ill-health brought about by over-work, and this has been the fate of too many men who have given the best part of their lives to the public service in Egypt and elsewhere.

Mr. A. Silva White’s book is a mass of information conveyed in readable form, and gives an outline of the history and all the physical and political factors of the problems which face this country in its future action in Egypt. Mr. White’s style is somewhat vitiated by his desire to work on the lines of Paley’s Evidences, and to build up his propositions with mathematical regularity and accuracy. But, setting this aside, The Expansion of Egypt is skilfully put together, and the whole tone and plan of the book beyond reproach. Mr. White puts the annexation down for 1905. It is a prophecy well worth bearing in mind. The appendices, which include some of the firmans governing Egypt, the decree establishing the Caisse de la Dette, the organic laws of Egypt, and so on, are very valuable; and the maps giving the orographic features, the climatological data, the zones of vegetation, and the political boundaries add to the completeness of the volume.

No one is better qualified than Mr. Stanley Lane Poole to write of the monarchs of the East, and few potentates are better worth a biography than Bábar, the first of the great Moghuls, and our predecessor as ruler of India. Bábar had but a short life, but every hour of it was fully employed. He was born in 1483, and at the age of eleven inherited the kingdom of Farghāna from his father, Omar Shaikh, the great-great-grandson of Tamerlane. But it is one thing to inherit and another to enjoy, and the child prince spent the next ten years of his life struggling for his inheritance—one day a deserted exile among the hills, the next a king with a large army; one day on the throne of his ancestors, the next with no man so poor to do him homage. Twice in those ten years he conquered Samarkand, the city of his great ancestor, and twice he lost it, till, at the age of twenty-one, he was but one of a crowd of struggling princes contending for the fragments of Tamerlane's empire between the Oxus and the Jaxartes. Then, in 1504, he set out for Cabul, and conquered the throne of Afghanistan. Samarkand being lost to him, he finally turned his attention to India, and, bursting through the Afghan passes by the immemorial road of conquest founded an empire in India which lasted in the hands of his descendants to our own day. From the age of eleven onwards he never kept the Feast of Bairam twice in the same place. His bodily strength was marvellous, and he was perpetually in the saddle, riding sometimes eighty miles a day. But besides being a great leader of men he was a poet and naturalist, and a wonderful organiser and legislator. His life is a very romance, and needs telling with a greater rush and sweep of words than Mr. Lane Poole employs. Babar died in 1530, at the age of forty-eight, his years having been crowded with events, with hardships, tumults, and strenuous energy. Out of nothing he made an empire by strength of body and force of will, and his headlong career proves the adage that men are nothing, but Man is everything.

The collection of books entitled the "British Empire" series will be complete in five volumes, of which India—covering also Ceylon, Straits Settlements, British North Borneo, and Hongkong—and Africa have been issued. India is introduced in an excellent article by Sir Raymond West, who takes up the attitude of an impartial looker-on. There are some two dozen articles in the volume, of which "Madras" is by Lord Wenlock, and "Bombay" by Lord Harris, each one an ex-governor; the Punjab, by Sir J. B. Lyall; the Central Provinces, by Sir Charles Grant; Hindu, Mohammedan, and Parsee Women, by writers of those communities; and the Administration of Justice in India, by Romesh Dutt, who exemplifies in his own person the remark made by Sir Raymond West in the Introduction, that "there is amongst the educated classes in India a disposition to take all that has been done, all that has been conceded as a mere matter of course, all that has been withheld as a just ground for discontent."

Africa, the second volume, is constructed on the same principles as India. Mr. J. Scott Keltie supplies the Introduction. Sir David Tennant deals with the Cape of Good Hope, Sir Sidney Sheppard with Bechuanaland, while Rhodesia is allotted to no fewer than three writers. Mr. W. Y. Campbell writes a just and excellent article on the Transvaal, and his array of figures and facts is well done in small compass; Mr. Fox Bourne writes in familiar, but restrained, style on Natives under British Rule in South Africa; Sir Henry Colville on Uganda; and Miss Kingsley supplies one of her racy and characteristic papers on "Life in West Africa." It is odd to find an article by the worthy but wrong-headed Miss Colenso in an English book. Its proper place is, rather, in an Anglophobe boulevard newspaper; but its appearance here is a signal proof of the tolerance of the nation, and of its willingness to hear both sides of a question. These volumes are valuable, but they must be read with discrimination and knowledge, and can hardly be looked upon as text-books. Both are adorned with excellent maps, and supplied with appendices which convey a great deal of useful information in a very small space. Future volumes will deal with "America," "Australasia," and "General."

With these books on the Empire of Greater Britain may be included Mr. Philip Gibbs's little work on Founders of the Empire. It is a volume for boys on the lives of such men as Alfred the Great, Sir Francis Drake, Clive, Wolfe, Nelson, Wellington, and others who helped to lay the foundations of the Empire. Mr. Gibbs is a little arbitrary in the choice of some of his heroes, but still the book is a good one for boys, and will aid them to understand how the British Empire, as we know it, is not the creation of a day, but the outcome of long years of evolution and strenuous endeavour.

The Brutalising Sea.

The Log of a Sea Waif. By F. T. Bullen. (Smith & Elder. 8s. 6d.)

WHAT is it that so brutalises the men that go down to the sea in sailing ships, or at least in such ships as Mr. Bullen, who has had an average sailor's career, has sailed in? All that poets, and even ordinary persons, find in "the mother and lover of men, the sea," has for the crew of these vessels no existence; the sea's beauty and terror, its mystery and immensity, its power to soothe and simplify and efface—all are inoperative. The skies are fair, the waters are foam-crested purple, the sunset is a supreme glory, the stars shine with an austere serenity that catches the breath, and it is all in vain; within the walls of such vessels as Mr. Bullen describes out of his long experience man is, the while, foul-mouthed, sullen, tyrannical, besotted. It puzzles us completely. Why are tramp seamen the wastrels of the earth? Why are tramp mates inhuman monsters? Why are tramp skippers heavy-handed bullies? On liners, on men-of-war, there is good-comradeship among officers and men. Why is it that Mr. Bullen's merchant mates cannot give orders without suggesting the slave-driver? One answer is, that few men are strong enough not to abuse the authority which command at sea gives them. The captain of a merchant ship, once it leaves port, is an absolute autocrat, and few men can stand such a position. Hence, on the part of the officers, unjust overbearance and self-indulgence, and, on the part of the crew, cowed submission and a deplorably low intellectual plane. Steam has altered things for the better, for the chief engineer and his staff, being largely independent of the captain—although, of course, under his orders—and keeping much to themselves, constitute a body of criticism which in a sailing ship is wanting.

These remarks are, however, somewhat beside the mark, except in leading to the confession that we are getting very tired indeed of the multiplication of books about brutal skippers, brutal mates, and brutal—but less offensively so—seamen. It is enough that they existed, and do exist; we do not want to read of them any more—except, perhaps, incidentally. Mr. Bullen showed what he could do in this way in his Cruise of the "Cachalot," which we thought in the main an exceedingly capable work, and we are irritated to find that descriptions of other degraded forecastles and outrageous cabins bulk so largely in that volume's companion, The Log of a Sea Waif. We do not doubt for a moment that Mr. Bullen went through all that he depicts; but it does not interest us to read it. The Cachalot gave us as much as we wanted, with the exciting and interesting account of whaling to overweight it. Here there is no whaling.

Mr. Bullen, however, always keeps to the point, is always patient and careful, is always credible, and occasionally gives us very good things indeed. His story of Peter, the worn-out old sailor, who died during a long calm, is excellent. At the moment he died the wind rose:

At last one night, when old Peter was holding his usual levée, he suddenly raised his voice, and authoritatively demanded that his auditors should bear him on to the fore-castle head. They instantly obeyed, lifting him tenderly upon his mattress, and laying him gently beside the capstan. Then all hands gathered round him in the darkness, only the glow of the pipes fitfully illuminating the rugged countenances. Slowly the moon rose, but sent no silvery pathway across the sea, until suddenly, as if with a great effort, she broke through the hampering mist-wreaths that seemed to clog her upward way. A pure, pale beam shot right athwart our vessel, lighting up the little group of watchers on the fore-castle, and lingering as if lovingly upon the withered, weather-scarred face of our shipmate. As it did so he smiled—a patient, happy smile—his lips unclosed, and, with a sigh of relief like a weary child, he died.

Breaking the steadfast silence came the mate's mellow cry, "Square the mainyard!" As the men rose to obey, a gentle breath, welcome as the first thrill of returning health, kissed the tanned faces. Slowly the great yards swung round, a pleasant murmuring as of a mountain rivulet arose from the bows, and the long calm was over.

Mr. Bullen does not often, in this work, write as well as in that last sentence. He has a habit of needlessly extending his remarks. Wishing to say, for example, that, when a small boy, he repented of joining his first ship, he writes: "So forbidding and hopeless was the outlook that, had it been practicable, I should certainly have retreated." Mr. Bullen, who has seen so much that is wonderful, and has so deep a reverence for the beauty of the sea and of nature, might well try always to say things a little more simply. One interesting comment we may note. "Coleridge's simile, 'As silent as a painted ship upon a painted ocean,' is," he says, "only a poet's licence, and grates upon a seaman." No ship is ever quite motionless, however calm it be.

Gay Rhymes from the Isis.

Lyra Frivola. By A. D. Godley. (Methuen.)

THE art of writing light verse that is fluent and crisp and intelligent is to be won only with much fasting. Light verse that is merely fluent is simple; light verse that is intelligent is not rare; but light verse that puts things so well that it has all the ease—with twice the felicity—of prose is very rare indeed. Of this art Calverley is the master. No one has attained to a similar cleanness of phrase, directness of expression, and inevitableness and naturalness of rhyme. Mr. Godley, whose little book lies before us, is, although an Oxonian, of the Calverley school.

When autumn's winds denude the grove,
I seek my Lecture, where it lurks
Mid the unpublished portion of My works,

And ponder, while its sheets I scan,
How many years away have slipt
Since first I penned that ancient manuscript.

I know thee well—nor can mistake
The old accustomed pencil stroke
Denoting where I mostly make
A joke—

Or where coy brackets signify
Those echoes faint of classic wit
Which, if a lady's present, I Omit.

Indirectly, perhaps, but of a surety, C. S. C. is the begetter of that verse form. His pupil, however, takes liberties which the master would not have sanctioned. Calverley would not have rhymed "imprisoned" and "isn't," "emptied" and "dreamt it," although this stanza from the same piece would have pleased him:

"Of course," you cry, "some brainless lad,
Some scion of ancient Tories,
Bob Acres, sent to Oxford ad
Emolliendos mores,
Meant but to drain the festive glass
And win the athlete's pewter!"
There you are wrong: this person was That undergraduate's Tutor.

Mr. Godley rhymes with singular skill now and then, and his metre never fails to run trippingly. Like most other humorous poets of the day he has his quatrains in the manner of Omar—the "Rubaiyat of Moderations":

Wake, for the Nightingale upon the Bough
Has sung of Moderations: ay, and now
Pales in the Firmament above the Schools
The Constellation of the boding Plough.

I, too, in distant Ages long ago
To him that ploughed me gave a Quid or so:
It was a fraud: it was not good enough;
Ne'er for my Quid had I my Quid pro quo.

But Mr. Godley, though very true to his Alma Mater, is not exclusively filial. His "Song for the Navy League," with its visions of scholarly bluejackets, needs no university sympathies for its appreciation. This is the conclusion:

Should he e'er be inclined his Tutors and Deans to look with contempt upon (Observing the maxims of Raleigh and Drake, who never thought much of a Don),
Let him think there are things in the nautical line that even a Don can do,
For only too well are examiners versed in the way to plough the Blue.

Though a captain per se is an excellent thing for repelling his country's foes,
He is better by far as an engine of war with a knowledge of Logic and Prose.
And a bold A.B. is the nation's pride in his rude uncultured way,
But prouder still will the nation be when he's also a bold
B.A.

CHORUS.

For the Horse Marine will be Tutor and Dean in the glorious days to be,
With his 'Yo, heave ho,' and his ὦ ἦ τό, and a Master Arts degree!

Other New Books.

MR. BLACKBURNE'S GAMES AT CHESS.

EDITED BY P. ANDERSON GRAHAM.

This is a book for chess-players, but Mr. Graham's Introduction has a more general interest. It is not necessary to play a game or practise an art in order to feel an interest in the champion of that game or art. Mr. Blackburne is the champion of English chess. Indeed, Mr. Graham is inclined to see in him "the ultimus Romanorum, the last of the great English chess players." The younger masters—Lasker, Pillsbury, Janowski, Marocsy, Lipke, and Charousek—are not Englishmen. The truth is that professional chess does not pay in England. Mr. Graham is frank enough to hint that this may not be a matter for regret, and we agree with him; but Mr. Blackburne's genius for the game, and his life-long devotion to it, are admirable. Born in Manchester in 1842, Mr. Blackburne began as a player of draughts. It was not until 1860 that he learned the moves of chess; but his powers developed fast, so fast that there was soon a crowd of admirers to lure and push him into the Bohemian life of a regular chess-player. From that time onwards Blackburne has waged and usually won battles of high chess.

Mr. Blackburne plays with an English calm which contrasts with the agitations of many of his foreign opponents. Yet the strain of a tournament tells on him as on others. Mr. Graham draws a curiously frank and rather gruesome picture of the effect of a great chess tournament on players:

The brainwork and anxiety develop all the physical weaknesses of the players; if a man has an infirmity, he becomes more infirm; if he is subject to disease the disease is almost certain to attack him. Mr. Blackburne is no exception to this rule, and the end of a congress generally brings on the bronchial complaint from which he has suffered so much. And the development of physical weaknesses is the least of it. The mental strain produces effects still more disagreeable. These modern gladiators, though they wage war only with harmless bits of wood, engage in as cruel a conflict as ever did those who wielded the sword and the rellarius. Not only money and fame, but even the means of livelihood depend on the issue, and when the last games come to be played, and those who have hoped against hope begin to see at last that victory is not for them, dejection and depression seize even on the light-hearted, and losers have been found sobbing like children in the corridors. On the other hand, I can fancy I see old Anderssen leaning on his stick and flinging his hat in the air with joy when sure of the first prize, and Marocsy clapped his hands with boyish glee when he won the last of his games in 1899.

Blackburne's calm in these "cruel" conflicts has earned him the titles of "The Giant," "The Man with the Iron Nerves," and "Black Death."

As a tournament player Mr. Graham thinks that Mr. Blackburne has never had an equal; but in personal matches his success has not been quite so absolute. Mr. Graham finds an explanation for this which is the more interesting on account of the analogy drawn between chess and literature:

In chess it is exactly the same as in literature—talent is always more sure of success than genius. The most ordinary "wood-shifter," by long study and analysis, can acquire a steady defensive style of wood-shifting, and if patient and fairly intelligent can work up to a high standard of play. One of his sources of strength is that he depends entirely on what, as a Scot would say, "is putten in wi' a spune." Any man of sound, clear common sense could become a chess-player of the first rank provided always that the fire and shadow of passion and fancy did not interfere with the steady, cold, calculating brain. But genius is something other, something beyond the first rank, and it is rare in chess as it is in letters. You could count on one hand all who deserve the name. I would go to the Café de la Regence for the first, for Philidor is the leader of the moderns. Breslau would give us the next, in point of time at all events; but who shall decide whether Anderssen was greater or less than Paul Morphy? With these the subject of this memoir deserves a place. He, too, has something beyond a talent for the game—he has genius. And I by no means say that this gift is always a blessing to its possessor. Talent is more under command, is more manageable, and while it is content to labour, genius has a haughty self-reliance that is not always justified. But just as one would never dream of admitting a man's name into the brief list of great writers simply on account of a vast sale of books, so the genius of a chess-player is demonstrated not by his victories but by the quality of his play. A modern match, indeed, is largely a trial of patience. Each competitor gets up an opening—a safe and sound one like the Ruy Lopez or the Queen's Gambit—and day after day toils at its variations. Genius will never shine at that task—you might as well harness Pegasus to a broomstick.

This book contains record of all Mr. Blackburne's best games, selected and annotated by himself. Their value to students of chess cannot be exaggerated, and Mr. Graham has imparted to the collection a decided human interest. (Longmans. 7s. 6d. net.)

ENGLISH EMBROIDERED BINDINGS. BY CYRIL DAVENPORT.

This is the first volume in a series of monographs on English books. The national character of the series will probably prove its best justification, for the tendency to look abroad for examples of the book-making arts has been overdone. Aldines and Elzevirs and French bindings have been allowed to elbow English productions out of the view of students, the very catholicity of taste shown by English collectors having contributed to this state of things. Mr. Pollard justly pleads that Touchstone's remark: "A poor thing, but mine own," might have been applied to this field of study with pleasant results. Moreover, he contends—and it is a tolerably safe contention—that "there is no art or craft connected with books in which England, at one time or another, has not held the primacy in Europe." A series of books which merely seized on these points and periods of supremacy would be highly useful, and the present series promises to include this treatment in its scope.

Mr. Cyril Davenport's volume deals with embroidered bindings in canvas, velvet, and satin. English binders used these materials with great freedom throughout the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, and their productions are quite worthy of separate study. Mr. Davenport reduces the subject to speedy order, showing the consecutive use of canvas, velvet, and satin, and the growth of design in each material. One of the most interesting examples reproduced in the book is Queen Elizabeth's MS. The Mirror or Glasse of the Synneful Soul, translated by the princess in her eleventh year "out of frenche ryme to english prose, joyning the sentences together as well as the capacite of my symple witte and small lerning coulde extende themselves." The book is one of the best-known treasures of the Bodleian Library. Many other examples of testaments, psalters, and prayer-books are reproduced and discussed by Mr. Davenport, who has done a real service to English bibliography. (Kegan Paul. 10s. 6d. net.)

SHETLAND FOLK-LORE. BY JOHN SPENCE, F.E.I.S.

Mr. Spence gives a liberal interpretation to the term "folk-lore," and devotes at least half his volume to an account of "The Picts and their Brochs" and other "Pre-historic Remains" of Shetland. He does not appear to be a very scientific anthropologist, for he thinks that Baal was worshipped at the Beltane, and identifies the "Finns" or sorcerers of local belief not with the "Fenians" of Celtic mythology, but with imaginary descendants of an early Finnish population of the islands. It would, therefore, have been well if he had distinguished a little more carefully between what in his book is due to first-hand observation, and what to learned theory. His account, however, of the beliefs, festivities, and pastimes of Shetlanders in the present and in the immediate past is interesting. The interpretation of the following charm, of which variants are found elsewhere, is a pleasing exercise of ingenuity:

Da twal, da twal Apostles;
Da 'leven, da 'leven Evangelists;
Da ten, da ten Commandments;
Da nine, da brazen shiuers;
Da eight, da holy waters;
Da seven, da stars o' heaven;
Da six, Creation's dawning;
Da five, da timblers o' da bools;
Da four, da gospel makers;
Da tree, da triddle treevers;
Da twa lily white boys that clothe themselves in green;
Da een, da een dat walks alon', an' evermore sall rue.

The curious sword dance which Sir Walter Scott found in Papa Stour appears to be now forgotten in Shetland. At least, Mr. Spence does not mention it. (Lerwick: Johnson & Greig.)

BOHEMIAN PARIS OF TO-DAY.

BY W. C. MORROW.

If we could choose an age and a place we should choose to be twenty and a student at the École des Beaux Arts in Paris. Responsibility rests lightly on the shoulders of the Paris art student, or rather it betakes itself elsewhere; black care does not sit behind him as he mounts the "imperiale" of the omnibus which shall presently clamber the heights of Montmartre; the world is his oyster, and oysters in Paris are plentiful, cheap, and succulent. And Mr. Morrow has chosen the right way to describe this life of irresponsible gaiety, in which work is fun and even pleasure is not a toil. He lies back, as it were, in an easy chair and gossips, dropping in the French phrase where the English fails, just as is natural with the American student in Paris. Lurid little pictures are given, too, dropped over the end of a cigarette, notably of the artist who made sketches in a café for a few sous apiece to keep the wolf from the door. Indeed, it is only when the author forgets that he is talking and imagines he is writing that he fails and becomes absurd. But that is rare.

Viewed, then, as the talk of an observant man, who sits on the corner of a studio table and tells stories, the book is amusing, instructive, admirable. Here, for instance, is a sketch of the "Beaux Arts" on a Monday morning, when the model for the week is chosen, and occasionally a new girl model is broken in. There is no privacy. The students gather round to observe. Then:

Frightened, trembling, blushing furiously, she ascends the throne, and innocently assuming the most awkward and ridiculous poses, forgetting in that terrible moment the poses she had learned so well under the tutelage of her friends. It is then that the fiendishness of the students rises to its greatest height. Dazed and numb, she hardly comprehends the ordeal through which she is now put. The students have adopted a grave and serious bearing, and solemnly ask her to assume the most outlandish and ungraceful poses. Then come long and mock-earnest arguments about her figure. . . . Then they put her through the most absurd evolutions to prove their points. At last she is made to don her hat and stockings; and the students form a ring about her and dance and shout until she is ready to faint.

"It isn't brute; it's boy." Perhaps Mr. Kipling's apology for Stalky & Co. will scarcely hold in this case. However, the model gains confidence with time, as may be learned from Mr. Morrow's amusing description of the "Bal des Quatr' Arts," which would infallibly cost any London house of entertainment its licence. But it should be added that none but genuine students—with their models—are admitted. Of the extraordinary cafés of Montmartre, too, in which every convention is slapped in the face, Mr. Morrow chatters pleasantly. In the "Cabaret du Soliel d'Or" he saw Verlaine, who came in unexpectedly with Bi-Bi-dans-la-Purée, the absinthe-soaked outcast, who is still to be seen with a roll of MS. under his arm in Montmartre:

The musical director, as well as a number of others in the place, stepped forward, and, with touching deference and tenderness, greeted the remarkable man and his two companions. It was easy to pick out Verlaine without relying on the special distinction with which he was greeted. He had the oddest slanting eyes, a small, stubby nose, and wiry whiskers, and his massive forehead heavily overhung his queerly shaped eyes. He was all muffled up to the chin; wore a badly soiled hat and a shabby dark coat. Under one arm he carried a small black portfolio. Several of the women ran to him and kissed him on both cheeks, which salutations he heartily returned, with interest.

So does Mr. Morrow gossip of his years at the "Beaux Arts"; and it must be confessed that his talk, though artless, is frank and amusing. M. Cucuel's illustrations are as admirable as they are plentiful. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

Fiction.

The Ship of Stars. By A. T. Quiller-Couch.
(Cassell & Co. 6s.)

MR. QUILLER-COUCH surrounds a somewhat hackneyed plot with a charm so personal and veracious that we may not question his right to launch his craft under so ambitious a title. The impressions of dreamy boyhood have seldom been more happily recorded than in the early history of Taffy, and it would be difficult to praise too warmly the narrative of his clerical father's connexion with the fox-hunting squire's spiritual throes, and the brutal and despotic way in which that ruffian attended to the welfare of his own soul. A man with humour and fancy need not bind himself to the convention of melodrama, and Mr. Quiller-Couch's story would have been better if he had shaken his head at that bedizened muse. But, no! he could not help giving us the handsome young Steerforth—we beg pardon, George Vyell—and as handsomely killing him off. Effective, but cheap, and smacking of the factory where minor fictions are made; but at least he did not make his heroine marry both sullied George and starry Taffy in turn. Taffy would have none of her, but sailed on unwedded in his "ship of stars."

There is plenty of salt spray dashing through the story, which is remarkable on account of its glamour of childhood and by virtue of a figure astonishingly grotesque and lively—that of a revivalist Jack of all Trades, who calls himself the King's Postman. This is the way he talks to the squire:

Try, brother, keep on trying. O, I've knowed cases—You can never tell how near salvation is. One minute's the heart's like a stone, and the next may be 'tis melted and singing like fat in a pan. . . . Ay, glory, glory! You've been a doubter. . . . Soon you'll be a shouter. Man, you'll dance like as David danced before the Ark! You'll feel it in your toes!

And yet the figure of God's Postman is never wholly ludicrous. His egoism, his teachableness, his sincerity, are too well observed. He and the earlier Taffy are quite genuine, and deserve to live when the book is closed. Of the manner of Mr. Quiller-Couch's essays in criticism there is never a hint in these pages. It is to be hoped that his release from the position of a Pontifical talker may result in a whole-hearted surrender to his real vocation, and that vocation is to write simple tales cunningly—tales like "Noughts and Crosses" and the interior narrative of this one, not quite buried, not unrecognisable as a star in the larger shape which contains it.

Young April. By Egerton Castle.
(Macmillan & Co. 6s.)

Young April is an admirable type of the high-class light serial—gay, yet with a due touch of melancholy, well-mannered yet audacious, idyllic yet discreetly hinting at the world's hardness. Life and character seen through the petals of a rose, and described with a touch which caresses but never grasps—that is Young April. Mr. Castle acquits himself very well: he is never crude, never relies upon the sensations of "To be continued," never through uncertainty or carelessness wanders outside his convention. You may deride the convention, saying that it is narrow and excessively artificial, and that it holds few possibilities; but Mr. Castle indubitably had the right to select his own convention, and to make what he could of it. He has at any rate made something of it; his work will appeal to many, and those not the least cultured. It is scarcely literature, but it is a passable substitute, at once bright, varied, frolicsome, and tender. More, it may be read very easily and very quickly.

In Young April we are introduced to a young man doing the grand tour with his tutor, the Rev. Smiley. (Time vague, but before railways.) The Rev. Smiley one morning has the satisfaction of learning that his ward has succeeded to a dukedom. His Grace at once determines to rid himself of the Rev. Smiley, and, having seized the money bags of the expedition, makes off in the guise of a postilion to a prima donna, with whom he is soon on terms.

With little screams, the prima donna still sought her belongings. If the Duke impeded rather than aided her efforts, who shall blame him? But everyone knows that to stoop after such a fashion is bound to bring the blood to the head, and once a man of twenty gets the blood to his head he is apt to do singular things. For the third time Eva Visconti's curls swept the Englishman's cheek.

"I have got the spoon!" she cried; and raised an innocently triumphant face.

"Oh," said the Duke, "how beautiful you are!"

He slipped his arm round her waist, and planted a kiss straight upon her lips.

The lady wasted no energy upon screams or protestation, but her open palm descended upon the boy's cheek with the report of a pistol.

Via the prima donna, the very youthful Duke of Rochester speedily arrives at adventures which have for their theatre a royal court, with a king and queen, and chivalry and loveliness to watch. Another woman supervenes, together with duels and so forth; but the resultant emotions are not permanent, and at the end the Duke is in his library, with faded ink and a dried flower.

Life had given the man no more than this—an April month, a memory of folly and frolic, of joy and of the bitterness which paid for it, a kiss from an idealised woman under a starlit sky—and these relics.

Mr. Castle seems to take a singular pride in his quotations. They range with graceful catholicity from Shakespeare to Edmund Rostand, but we scarcely see why he should have begun his book with a list of them.

An Englishman. By Mary L. Pendered.
(Methuen & Co. 6s.)

In this novel, at once sound and diverting, Miss Pendered depicts the life of a small provincial town of middle England. Market Grazen is apparently the local metropolis of an agricultural district; it touches the large landowner on one side and the roving Socialist candidate for Parliament on the other. The tradesmen of the town and their various folk are made the principal characters in the book, and chief among them is Michael Rolf, grocer, cricketer, and athlete—the "Englishman" of the title.

Michael's young sister Nanny required something between a companion and a governess, and it was in response to his advertisement that Maia Lovel, a young woman of aristocratic birth and the highest education, came down into Market Grazen to fill a position in the Rolf household. Maia came not because she must, but because she would. She had a fancy to earn her living. The enterprise begun she did not look back. She was sensible and strong-minded, and though the atmosphere of the grocery and of Market Grazen at first disgusted her, she forced herself to seek for the sterling good beneath the repellent superficies of provincial manners. She taught her ward; she helped with the accounts; she presided at the assistants' breakfast-table.

"Frightfully slow place, Market Grazen, miss, beastly slow, if I may use a vulgar expression," said Smith, rapidly disposing of a large mouthful of bread and ham; "me and Mundin, bein' used to a large town, both of us, got the 'ump awful at first, didn't we, Mundin? There's nothin' doin', nothin' at all, I assure you. A jolly good music 'all 'ud rouse us up a bit—that's what we want. But, bless you, the folks 'ere are so mighty good and proper they'd 'ave fits at the bare idea. It's all Bible-classes and tea-fights with them. More 'am, Mundin, please, and cut it thick; I'm 'ungry," he ended, with a wink at Maia, who could not decide whether or no it were safe to smile at his grotesqueness.

Mr. Mundin looked disgust.

"There's nothing more repulsive than thick ham," he said, with an emphatic aspirate that was like the letting off of steam. The Rolfs, brother and sister, both treated the letter h with certain consideration; the assistant raised it above the level of its fellows and throned it with ostentation. The significance of this peremptory articulation did not, however, penetrate the consciousness of Smith. He babbled on unreprieved.

Maia found the sterling good, and found it soon, and she ended by marrying Michael. The central idea of the story—this mating of a refined and distinctly patrician girl with a grocer who was, of course, quite 'out of her world'—is unusual and even fanciful; and though it is treated with much skill and resource, and the excellent virtues of the grocer are fully brought out, we are scarcely prepared to admit that Miss Pendered has convinced us of its possibility. The merit of the novel, however, lies elsewhere—in the hundred minor descriptions of character and event, and the general effect—kaleidoscopic, but not confusing—of a town's life. Mrs. Pendered's school treats and cricket matches, and fires and elections and scandals, her butchers and jewellers, and Baptist elders and retired spinsters, and foolish girls and staid wives, show a just and keen observation, and some humour. She has made unimportant mistakes here and there, and one is conscious of a certain slight literary untidiness. But, take it as a whole, An Englishman is a meritorious and promising performance, instinct with sincerity.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE SNOW ON SHAH-DAGH AND AMMALAT BEY.

BY ALEXANDRE DUMAS, PÈRE.

These are the two romances which have lately been brought forward, on what appears to be very good evidence, as unpublished works of Alexandre Dumas, père. The two stories deal with Tartar life, and together make a volume of the usual novel size. The discoverer of the MSS. is M. S. Apostolides. The translator is Mr. Home Gordon. (Simpkin, Marshall. 6s.)

COLD STEEL.

By M. P. SHIEL.

A story of Henry the Eighth and Wolsey, and fighting and intrigue, by the author of The Yellow Danger. The heroine is one Bessie Ford, whose sister Laura falls under the eye of the King and has to be removed to a place of safety. The removal makes the story. (Richards. 6s.)

RISING FORTUNES.

By JOHN OXENHAM.

This story, by the author of God's Prisoner, deals with the fortunes of a young Scottish artist and his friend, a journalist, who come to London to make their way. We see much of small and desperate journalistic strivings in Fleet-street. "It's a long way up," says one struggling editor, showing his room in Fleet-street, "but I like it, it's so damnably quiet, an' when folks come humming after accounts, they try it once or twice, and the next time they look up the stair, and away home, and report that there was no one in again. Oh, aye! it has its advantages once ye get up. . . . An' what can I do for ye, Adam, ma man? Ha'e ye gotten a grup o' anything yet?" (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

THE TONE KING.

By HERIBERT RAU.

This is one of three romances in which Rau deals with the lives of Mozart, Beethoven, and Weber. It is well translated by Mr. J. E. St. Quintin Rae. There is an account of the first presentation of "Don Giovanni": "When Mozart appeared to conduct, he was received with ringing cheers from the crowded house. He bowed low; his heart was full of joy. In his eyes shone tears of delight. The baton fell, and, like the trumpet-call of the Last Judgment, the first chords of the andante resounded." (Jarrold. 6s.)

KINSAH.

By MAY CROMMELIN.

Kinsah is a daughter of Tangier—"white Tangier by the dark blue sea." The members of the British Legation and their women-folk are introduced, and the romance takes colour and variety from Christian and Mohammedan life. The descriptions of scenery are many and alluring. (John Long. 6s.)

THE REALIST.

By HERBERT FLOWERDEW.

The realist is Auguste Zant, who has come to England to write a novel dealing with our national character. He writes novels from life, and when he wants a harrowing scene he creates it. "Is it true that you strangled your housekeeper?" asks the hero in the character of an interviewer. "Oh, yes, it is true," he said indifferently. "I have seen it stated that I performed the experiment in order to describe the effects of strangulation. That is scarcely true, for I knew already. My idea was chiefly to try how much pacification would be necessary to make the poor creature my friend again." (Lane. 6s.)

THE GUESTS OF MINE HOST.

By MARIAN BOWER.

Talk, dining, billiards, gossip, and excursions among a cosmopolitan crowd at the Beau Rivage Hotel at La Séverie. Amid it all a love drama is shaped, in which two men and a young married woman (who is tortured by the circumstances of her married life) play their parts. The story is well written and conceived. (Cassell & Co. 6s.)

I LIVED AS I LISTED.

By ARTHUR L. MAITLAND.

A pleasing romance of the Restoration, with plenty of action. When things were quiet "we did fall for awhile into easy conversation, and the mouthing of such merry quips as we could recollect." Indeed, the mouthing is overdone. "'Nan, dear,' said I sadly, 'I have happed on evil times.' And I did draw a sigh." (Wells Gardner. 6s.)

TALES OF TERROR.

By DICK DONOVAN.

Tales of terror indeed. The first, "The Woman with the Oily Eyes," is the horrible story of a modern vampire. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

PHIL OF THE HEATH.

By HAROLD CHILD.

A readable melodramatic story. Phyllis Woolcombe is an heiress, stands five feet eleven, and rides the biggest horse in the West Country. Her life and character are attacked, she is charged with murder, is released from Bristol gaol in the Chartist riots, has a soldier lover, and a villainous cousin. (Pearson Ltd. 6s.)

LOAVES AND FISHES.

By BESSIE REYNOLDS.

A vigorous study of Little Bethel politics. The consequential, self-made deacons stint their pastor of the loaves and fishes that are his due, and treat him and his wife with insolence and unkindness. Written to expose the evil of too many chapels, each supporting a half-starved pastor. (Stock.)

A LAWFUL CRIME.

By EDWARD KENT.

This is described as "a story of to-day," but it rather belongs to some doubtful yesterday. It is compounded of a young marriage, an absent husband, an unscrupulous lover, a plot, an imprisonment, a forced wedding—and then wrongs begin to be righted. Much of the action passes in France, where the heroine is entrapped and imprisoned by her father's mistress. (Leadenhall Press. 6s.)

THE PRIEST'S MARRIAGE.

By NORA VYNNE.

A study of marriage by the author of The Blind Artist's Pictures, &c. Is an ex-priest or a mere natural man the best husband for a girl like Annie Fulton? The riddle is solved by experiment. (Burleigh. 6s.)

THE LOVE AFFAIRS OF A CURATE.

By MARCUS REAY.

This diary of a curate, supposed to have been stolen by a bad boy, shows how the Rev. George Grey had a good deal of puritanical nonsense knocked out of him. Going on the river on Sunday with qualms of conscience, he sees his bishop gliding by in another boat, &c., &c. (John Long. 3s. 6d.)

HARCOURT.

By AUTHOR OF "DAUGHTERS OF THE CITY."

Not he of Malwood. Yet the atmosphere is political, and perhaps this concerns the modern Plantagenet: "Nothing is more comic than a Liberal leader proclaiming his sublime devotion to high principle, his scorn of base expediency: while 'Distrust of the people—if they're women,' and 'Women being in the majority, we must not enfranchise them,' are the principles he practises." A novel in which love and the franchise are alternately to the fore. (Simpkin. 6s.)

BOFFIN'S FIND.

By ROBERT THYNNE.

A story of Australian sheep-farming and gold-mining, written—the author points out—"before the De Rougemont narrative made any public appearance." The time in Botany Bay days, and the story hums with life, adventure, and villainy. Mr. Thynne is the author of The Story of Australian Exploration. (Long. 6s.)

We have also received The River Syndicate, and Other Stories, the first of which is a detective story, by Charles E. Carryl (Harper & Brothers. 2s.); The Beautiful Evil, a fantasy of Indian life and religions, by Alexander Eager (Sands & Co. 6s.); Love Knots, by May Crommelin (Jarrold. 3s. 6d.); Margaret at the Manse, a series of Scottish stories, illustrated, by Ethel T. Heddle (Wells Gardner. 6s.); Charles Waverdon and Others, "a medley" dealing with "the upper stratum of society thirty years ago," by Caryl J. Blunt (Stock. 6s.); Malcolm Ross, a story of ministerial life in West Scotland, by Alexander Craib (Stock. 6s.).

The Novel of the Moment.

An Enquiry.

ON Tuesday, October 24, eight thousand copies of it were offered to London, and it was also published in New York and in the Colonies. Mr. Mudie desired two thousand copies for his library. The trade generally was hungry and pertinacious. Over two thousand supplementary copies were ordered on November 2, and the same on November 3. A Teuton expressed a wish to translate it into German. Tauchnitz said that he wanted it, and a dramatist asked permission to dramatise it. On the 9th the first edition was exhausted, and large orders yet unfulfilled; but a great firm of printers had the affair in hand, and on the 15th, by the aid of their resources, a second edition of ten thousand copies was ready to be devoured. In the meantime the morning papers sang together. England and Scotland lifted up one laudatory voice. "The book must go right to the front of contemporary literature." "The plot . . . would alone have secured for it the eager attention of critics." "The same gift of divining things, the same sincerity, and nearly the same insight as"—the author of Jane Eyre. "Challenges comparison with Charlotte Brontë." "Not to be surpassed in contemporary fiction." "Without doubt a masterpiece."

Such is the history of the first three weeks of Red Pottage, by Mary Cholmondeley (Edward Arnold), the novel of the moment. Many people will ask: "Who is Mary Cholmondeley?" But these people will not be subscribers to Mudie's. For Miss Cholmondeley, though she has written little, was from the first a sort of power at Mudie's. With Diana Tempest she secured a firm position there, and, though it is some time since Diana Tempest, the clients of Mudie—even those who make novel-reading the stern business of life and require a new story every day—do not soon forget a favourite. Red Pottage was sure of a special attention. It was not, however, sure of the enormous vogue which it is now enjoying. Sudden dazzling popularities have been a fairly regular phenomenon of late years—at least two have occurred within six months—but the vogue of Red Pottage is still striking enough to startle. That it surprised the publisher himself is shown by the fact that the second edition of the book is larger than the first.

Thus at a single stride Miss Cholmondeley steps from the comparative obscurity of being "a popular author" into the brilliant white light of full celebrity. Yesterday it was: "Mary Cholmondeley—you know . . . wrote a splendid thing called Diana Tempest, awfully interesting; you ought to read it." To-day it is: "Mary Cholmondeley . . . What, you don't mean to say you haven't read . . . !" And he to whom "Mary Cholmondeley" is unfamiliar will henceforth hide his ignorance like a sin. That is fame. Miss Cholmondeley is famous. In three weeks she has become so. Why?

In the first place, there is strength in her work. We have read perhaps a thousand novels since we read Diana Tempest, and forgotten nine hundred and fifty, but we clearly remember that not only the plot but the characterisation of this story interested us. The talent was unmistakable. We resolved to keep the author in view. The sight of her name in the publishers' advertisements last month at once filled us with anticipations, and we perused Red Pottage at the earliest moment. We mention these facts because our experience was probably a common one. The opening chapters of the story effectually raised our curiosity. Hugh Scarlett has a liaison with Lady Newhaven. Lord Newhaven discovers the adultery (not before Hugh is sick of his Diana), and, with a calmness which is characteristic of him, invites Hugh to draw lots for the privilege of committing suicide within the next five months. Hugh, surprised, accepts Lord Newhaven's somewhat Ovidian proposition—and loses. The question is: Will Hugh abide by the result? Miss Cholmondeley has here an excellent situation. It is melodramatic; but none the worse on that score, since melodrama is a perfectly legitimate form of literary art, capable of the finest uses. (See Balzac's La Grande Brèche or Scott's Wandering Willie's Tale.) She handles it with originality, force, and ingenuity. At the end of the book surprise grows out of surprise in a manner productive of many thrills. So far as the Newhavens and Hugh Scarlett are concerned, Red Pottage is a good, exciting story, ornamented with some rather clever analysis of motive, and very well told, save for a slight occasional hesitancy and indirectness in the later passages.

But the affaire Newhaven-Scarlett is only a small part of Red Pottage. Miss Cholmondeley has no sooner stated her theme than she deliberately discards it. Gifted with what is called "a keen eye for character," she so preoccupies herself with the exploitation of the special powers of that eye that she loses sight of her story for a good two hundred pages. It is necessary to state here that Hugh Scarlett falls in love with a certain rare creature, Rachel West; that Rachel has an intimate friend, Hester Gresley (who wrote the greatest novel of her time); that Hester has a brother, the Rev. James Gresley, with a wife and family; and that the latter have some snobbish plutocratic friends named Pratt. These people are spread abroad over the book. Their motives and actions are described in detail. Yet they do not help the story; they have nothing but an adventitious and non-essential connexion with the story. It might be said that Miss Cholmondeley had fallen into the usual English error of writing two novels in one, but these extraneous persons and scenes do not in fact make a story by themselves. The sole result of them, viewing the book strictly as a work of art, is to fret and delay the satisfaction of an artfully aroused curiosity. Nevertheless, we imagine that the gross redundancies of the book have had a large share in the making of its success.

The popularity of Red Pottage springs from three things. The first is the melodramatic excitements of the main theme. These are good, but they pervade only a fractional part of the story. The second is the observation of that "keen eye for character" to which we have referred. Miss Cholmondeley sees character intensely, but very crudely. Her good people are too good, and her bad people are too bad. They seldom depart from their codes. Certain of her creatures she adores; certain others she hates. It is in the delineation of the hated that she renders herself popular. She observes them with positive rancour, and makes them the butt of sarcasm which is like a skittle-ball among the pins. Thus of the Pratts:

Selina was the most popular, being liable to shrieks of laughter at the smallest witticisms, and always ready for that species of amusement termed "bally-ragging" or "hay-making." But Ada was the most admired. She belonged to that type which in hotel society and country towns is always termed "queenly." She "kept the men at a distance." She "never allowed them to take liberties," &c., &c. She held her chin up and her elbows out, and was considered by the section of Middlesex society in which she shone to be very distinguished. Mrs. Pratt was often told that her daughter looked like a duchess; and this facsimile of the aristocracy, or rather of the most distressing traits of its latest recruits, had a manner of lolling with crossed legs in the parental carriage and pair, which was greatly admired. "Looks as if she was born to it all," Mr. Pratt would say to his wife.

So are the Pratts disposed of and labelled for ever, and the public persuaded that in reading Red Pottage it is appreciating social satire of a very subtle order. But human beings are not thus easily to be ticketed and shelved. Such facile and disdainful sarcasm may raise a laugh, but the art of it is neither serious nor delicate. In a word, it is coarse, and there is a great deal of it in Red Pottage. The Rev. Mr. Gresley, for another example, is treated with the crudest hostility; he is a grotesque puppet, set up, apparently, so that the author may gratify her anti-Philistine spleen in knocking him down.

The third element of popularity in Red Pottage is the strain of easy philosophising in terms of vague metaphor which runs through it. Here is an example:

Most of us have in our time hammered nails into our walls, which, though they now decorously support the engravings and etchings of our maturer years, were nevertheless originally driven in to uphold the cherished, the long since discarded chromos of our foolish youth.

There is no doubt that this sort of reflection does please and even impress a certain type of mind. Of the thousands who will relish the quoted passage, not one could turn it into a plain statement of fact, for the reason that it is incapable of being so turned. "Chromos" stands for one kind of ideal, and "engravings and etchings" for another kind of ideal, but our belief is that Miss Cholmondeley herself would be puzzled to explain the rôle of "nails" in the metaphor. Yet the sentence has a pleasant and plausible air with it.

Opinions may differ as to the presence or absence of this or that quality of excellence in Miss Cholmondeley's novel. But on some points concerning it competent opinions cannot differ: it is very clumsily constructed; it contains many passages and some characters which have no bearing whatever upon the theme; the author exhibits a shameless partiality among her characters; and she has almost no feeling for style in any fine sense of the word. These four charges could be proved before a jury. And so it must be asserted, strenuously though with sorrow, that Red Pottage is not a masterpiece, that it does not challenge comparison with Charlotte Brontë, that it is not unsurpassed in modern fiction, and that Miss Cholmondeley's reward has exceeded her deserts.

To utter a jeremiad upon the decadence of taste, to declare that literature is going to the dogs because a fourth-rate novel has been called a masterpiece and has made someone's fortune, would be absurd. We have a strong faith that taste is as good as ever it was, and that literature will continue on its way undisturbed. The extraordinary phenomena marking the birth of Red Pottage have occurred frequently before, and in a form more acute. Even now A Double Thread is touching its fiftieth thousand. All this is naught. In ten years, in twenty years—what then? Perhaps then the excellent, but impetuous public may remember that in 1899 "Zuck" issued On Trial and that in those days Mr. Walter Raymond was also fertile. Who knows? In the meantime, let us admit with alacrity that Miss Cholmondeley is a writer of parts. Had she not been so, she could scarcely have written a fourth-rate novel, which is at least six degrees higher than the average. And let us point out that Miss Cholmondeley is in no way responsible for the hysteria of good-natured criticism, or the panic rush of the populace to take the horses out of her carriage and drag her to the high summits of Parnassus.

Style and the "Edinburgh Review."

THE article in the current Edinburgh Review on "Some Tendencies of Modern Style" deserves attention in more ways than one. Its declared aim is to criticise some recent efflorescences of the younger phrase-mongers who follow their Meredith not wisely but too well. Herein we have every sympathy with it. The application to the novel of a style perilous in the essay is an innovation to be deplored. The aim of such style is great minuteness of word selection: the sentence is to become a mosaic of recherchés and carefully tested words. In the hands of a master this may succeed. It may succeed by a fastidious reticence, a delicate sense of the too much, a chastened instinct where to stop. But in most hands—as one might prophesy, and as we see in fact—the tendency of such narrowed attention to the individual word is to throw the sentence out of focus. There should be an organic relation and subordination in the vocables of a sentence, a distinction of major and minor. But in the strained minuteness of the writer's attention to language he misses sight of this with distressing result. The words lose their perspective, and start out upon the reader with an unnatural separate distinctness:

Each particular word doth stand on end,
Like quills upon the fretful porcupine.

It has an effect like the painful heightening of individual objects in a nightmare vision. In fact, such a sentence (unconsciously to the writer) is veritably dislocated; as in the drawing of a beginner, where noses and other features assume abnormal proportions. Each word may be accurate and defensible in itself, but the total result is false because relation—comparative importance—has been neglected. It is an error parallel to the pre-Raphaelite assemblage of severally-studied details in an unrelated whole. And all this becomes tenfold worse when the writer intensifies the impression by packed audacities of imagery. The effect is phantasmagoric. One's eyes ache, seeking and finding no place of rest.

But here our agreement with the reviewer ceases. It is, unhappily, only at the close of his article that he reaches these justified animadversions. The rest of the article is consumed in an elaborate attempt to provide a foundation of principle for his forthcoming strictures. For this purpose he revives the mischievous fallacy that "you should write as you speak." When it is considered that there are whole ranges of themes which are practically excluded from speech, the fallacy and inadequacy of this principle seems evident. It is true that the reviewer modifies it by saying that speech should be the model for prose. True, in the same sense that the skeleton is the model for the flesh. But the reviewer means much more; he contends that the nearer prose is to speech the better it is. Armed with this law, he surveys the range of English prose, and makes devastating work. Passing over his loose introduction, which contains fallacies of thought enough to require an article for their discussion, it is sufficient to say that one main result, if not object, of his essay is virtually to set aside and condemn a whole mode of English prose; and with it to clear away from our literature a stately grove of noble writers. On his principle, of course, the eighteenth century is the great period of our prose. With ruthless logic he carries his theory to its full consequences, brushing aside the entire seventeenth century. A principle which condemns at one fell swoop Milton and Sir Thomas Browne and Jeremy Taylor, and their great brethren, stands surely self-condemned. If either they or the principle must go, it will be hard for the principle!

The truth is, that it is pedantry to limit prose within any external order of style. The form of prose is determined by its aim—by its subject-matter and the writer's design in treating that subject-matter. As this approaches or recedes from the aims of speech, the style should, and must, approach or recede from the usual structure of speech. Where it is widely different from unpremeditated speech, that is because theme and aim are widely different from anything conceivable in speech. But here we touch one cause of the reviewer's error. He wishes to draw a fast line between prose and poetry. Metre, he thinks, is the proper distinction between poetry and prose; therefore, outside metre, the more prosaic your writing (the nearer to speech, in his phrase), the better it will be, as a matter of style. But metre is not the proper distinction between poetry and prose (though a distinction convenient for general observation). As a proof, take the poetical books of the Bible. They have been rendered into prose so superbly fit that all attempts, even by poets, to substitute metrical form have utterly failed. Here you have grand poetry without metre. What, then, has it which distinguishes it, outwardly, from prosaic prose? It has rhythm. It is the presence of lofty and noble rhythm which invests the poetry of the Bible with such satisfying and wholly congruous form. And it is rhythm which really is the necessary medium of poetry, not metre. But rhythm varies gradually and imperceptibly through numberless gradations, from the highest to the lowest, till it disappears in the pedestrian progress of average prose. It follows that there is no such fast line between poetry and prose as the Edinburgh Reviewer supposes. Poetry and prose can, and sometimes do, play into each other. Prose, therefore, becomes a vast spectrum, fading into poetry at one end, into journalism at the other (or, if the Reviewer prefer the phrase, into the forms of ordinary speech). To which of these two extremities a given style shall approximate depends wholly on the writer's aim. Prose in the past has divided itself into two great modes, represented by the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The prose of Browne and Jeremy Taylor was well towards the upper, or poetic, end of the spectrum, without actually passing into it, like the poetic books of the Bible. The prose of Swift and Dryden was well towards the lower, or colloquial, end, though far from passing into it—much further than certain modern prose. But both were as legitimate as they were separate modes of prose. That the eighteenth century is a fitter model for the general requirements of prose is obvious. But that does not sweep from the ranks of the great masters of style Taylor, and Browne, and Hooker, and their fellows. And God forbid it should!

Things Seen.

Proof.

NIGHT had come weeping; and as I plunged along miry Wellington-street, I wondered why upon earth the old gentleman ahead of me could not enter that Waterloo omnibus and be done with it. He stepped back at last, and, springing forward, I had my wonder explained away. "Full up!" grunted the conductor; and, as I fell back, muttering plain words, my old gentleman, with his cruddled, kindly face, grey almost to whiteness, and bright eyes shaggily overhung, ranged alongside me. "Better to walk it," he said, as we forged along. "Does you good, I think. I've to catch the 6.10 express to Blankley; but there's time enough, I fancy."

"Really! To Blankley? My own case exactly. I live there."

"Well, well; that's odd. Harper's my name; Harper, Blankley, finds me; yes, these thirty years. And yet I never met you, sir. You've business in town, likely; Ludgate-hill, now, or Cheapside?"

"No; no, I write books for my living."

"Ah; books, eh? Well, there's a deal too many books written nowadays, by my way of it."

"I thoroughly agree with you."

"Yes. If folk would only read their Bibles more, now, and leave these stories alone—ah! Why, I saw a ton of 'em given away to-day. Fictions an' bright readings, as they call 'em; and far enough I wished 'em—just when we was distributing Bibles too, an' good books, on the troopships. Ah, yes, they're bad things, these stories, sure enough, and they do a sight of harm. They're not founded on the Rock, ye see; not on a basis of truth. But with the Bible— Why, look at Job, now! There was a man for you!"

"Very fine," I said; "very fine indeed. But there are folk, you know, who say the Book of Job was no more than a play, a drama, you know, and not history, at all."

"Play;—drama! Huh! No, sir; inspiration; true, every word of it, sir. Job was a living man, just as sure as you an' me. I know it; I know it like—like I know that my Redeemer liveth. An' now I'll tell you a little anecdote to prove it. Yes, an' I daresay it's true too— Why, bless me, yes; I know it is. It was the Presbyterian minister at Chelsea told me about it, when I was a lad. He said— How these 'buses follow on, to be sure! See those three; all full. Well, rock oil, y' know, was a new thing then, I fancy; an' some smart young fellow, as it might be yoursel— From Ecclesiastes, I think it was, he got it: 'No new thing under the sun.' 'Why,' ses he, 'look at rock oil! Whoever heard of oil out of a rock before?' Mocking, you see. Then my friend he turns up Job—Job twenty-nine or thirty, I think it is; somewhere along there—'And the rock poured me out rivers of oil.' That shows you, ye see. That was how he rebuked the young man, out of Holy Writ; that's writin' founded on the Living Rock. 'Rivers of oil!' Doesn't that prove it for ye? Real! Just as real as you an' me; glory to God! But these stories— There, but you say you write 'em. Well, I daresay they're not all bad. But it's better to work for Christ, I say. And so you live at Blankley?"

Bathos.

FROM his service boots to his trim little moustache and jaunty cap he was beautiful, the khaki-clad soldier, as he mounted into the 'bus. We all felt it, and longed to speak to him; and envied the tall lame man who might and did. We looked at him as much as we could without seeming to, and we listened. He was going out to-day: so much we learned, and our hearts swelled. He spoke straight out, with a soldierly simplicity that appealed. Ah, to be a man and to do these things!

At Holborn the omnibus was cleared but for the soldier, a sanguine middle-aged lady, and myself. She looked at me with a glance that pleaded, "Under the circumstances . . ."; and turning frankly upon him,

"And so," she purred, "you are going out!"

With the simple directness proper to the British Army, "Yes," said he, "I am going out to-day."

"Are you really, now!" She seemed to munch the notion: it was, one might fairly conjecture, her first occasion of actual contact with the heroic. With a large sentimental smile she surveyed him. Then she plunged into a conversation. . . .

At Drury-lane I alighted. Poised upon the rear-platform I caught a question.

"And what regiment?" she asked.

I had one foot in the air; but, with a view to adding a new personal interest to the morning perusal of my paper, I hung on. A momentary check was overpassed, but the voice that answered had lost something of its resonance.

"Commissariat," it answered. . . .

"Well, that's better than nothing— isn't it?" said the middle-aged lady.

The Amateur Critic.

The Ancestors of the Boers.

IN the Harleian Miscellany (ii. 591) is preserved an account of a royal voyage to Holland from the pen of an English gentleman of the train of William III. (whom he styles "the Conqueror"). The man was a courtier in the first place—the document is plastered with adulation—but he was also an acute observer, and he could write pretty well. Having landed at the Hague, he pauses merely to note the "curious hard sandy shore, admirably contrived by nature for the divertisement of people of quality," then passes on to an examination of the Manners, Customs, and Comical Humours of the Boers. Certain of his sentences are likely to be appreciated by a larger public than that for which they were written. These, without further "pesterment of formalities," I proceed to transcribe:

You may sooner convert a Jew [he writes] than to make an ordinary Dutchman yield to arguments that cross him. . . .

They are seldom deceived, for they trust no-body; so by consequence are better to hold a fort than win it; yet they can do both. Trust them you must if you travel, for to ask a bill of particulars is to put in a wasps' nest; you must pay what they ask as sure as if it were the assessment of a subsidy.

Compliments is an idleness they were never trained up in; and it is their happiness that Court pleasures have never stole away their minds from business. . . .

. . . In short, they are a race diligent rather than laborious, dull and slow of understanding; and so not dealt with by hasty words, but managed easily by soft and fair; and yielding to plain reason, if you give them time to understand it.

To Mr. Swinburne.

POET, who weavest wondrous webs of words,
And clang'st thy lyre with wild and boisterous hand!
Oft, as we listen to thy music grand
Still rolling in reverberating chords,
We hear the roar of guns and clash of swords
Borne on the air; then, swift at thy command,
Our pulses quicken, our desires expand
To urge thy hates, to hallow thine accords.
Yet, would we crave thy Muse to turn awhile
To gentler arts—to sing the song of War
In softer strain. Put up thy scimitar,
And let sweet peace thy stormy soul beguile:
Such were a solace soother in "reverse"
Than all the colder comfort of a curse!

For an Anthology of Parody.

SOME of the wittiest parodies that I have ever read have been among those which appear in the newspapers from time to time on topical events. I recollect seeing a travesty of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's "Bobs," addressed to Sir Arthur Sullivan under the title of "Babs" during a recent cause célèbre. I wish I had preserved it, it was so clever. But one of the most interesting parodies is the little-known, self-inflicted Swinburnian "Nephelidia," to be found among those unparalleled Specimens of Modern Poets, The Heptalogia, a book which certainly ought to be in the hand of the compiler of an anthology of parody. No one knowing these verses should accuse Mr. Swinburne of a lack of humour; has ever a poet of note burlesqued his own peculiarities of style in so frank a manner? Here are a few lines:

From the depth of the dreamy decline of the dawn through a notable nimbus of nebulous noonshine, Pallid and pink as the palm of the flag-flower that flickers with fear of the flies as they float,
Are the looks of our lovers that lustroously lean from a marvel of mystic miraculous moonshine,
Those that we feel in the blood of our blushes that thicken and threaten with throbs through the throat?
Thicken and thrill as a theatre thronged at appeal of an actor's appalled agitation,
Fainter with fear of the fires of the future than pale with the promise of pride in the past;
Flushed with the famishing fulness or fever that reddens with radiance of rather recreation, Gaunt as the ghastliest of glimpses that gleam through the gloom of the gloaming when ghosts go aghast?
Nay, for the nick of the tick of the time is a tremulous touch on the temples of terror, Strained as the sinews yet strenuous with strife of the dead who is dumb as the dust-heaps of death:
Surely no soul is it, sweet as the spasm of erotic emotional exquisite error,
Bathed in the balms of beatified bliss, beatific itself by beatitude's breath.

The Tyranny of Association.

THE criticism passed in the ACADEMY last week on the excess of detail in Mr. Millais's life of Sir John Everett Millais derives support from the following curious extract from the book. Mr. Millais is telling us how Miss Siddal (afterwards Mrs. Rossetti) "sat" to Millais for his beautiful picture of Ophelia drifting down the stream to her death. He says:

Miss Siddal had a trying experience. . . . In order that the artist might get the proper set of the garments in water, and the right atmosphere and aqueous effects, she had to lie in a large bath filled with water, which was kept at an even temperature by lamps placed beneath. One day, just as the picture was nearly finished, the lamps went out unnoticed by the artist, who was so intensely absorbed in his work that he thought of nothing else, and the poor lady was kept floating in the cold water till she was nearly benumbed. She herself never complained of this, but the result was that she contracted a severe cold, and her father (an auctioneer at Oxford) wrote to Millais threatening him with an action of £50 damages for his carelessness. Millais paid the doctor's bill; and Miss Siddal, quickly recovering, was none the worse for her cold bath.

That she was none the worse is eternally satisfactory. It is the picture that is to suffer now! Mr. Millais should have remembered the tyranny of association. Few readers of the story will be able to look at "Ophelia" without seeing Miss Siddal floating in her bath, the lamps out, the painter oblivious, and rheumatism and warts stalking in the background. It is an awful example.

Wanted: Novels of Observation.

ONE is often impressed by the sad want of originality shown by young novelists in the choice of plots and subject matter. They seem to be re-arranging old, worn effects, and rarely extending that Edom over which Fiction should cast out its shoe. Literary promotion awaits the young novelist who will apply his faculties to the faithful, critical representation of a few definite yet well-known phases of life. For instance, the life of a great drapery establishment must be full of comedy and more or less suppressed human nature, both well worth treating. The innumerable City clerk, his punctual journeys, his virtues and temptations, still awaits his novelist. And the Aerated Bread Girl—who will gather her in?

Publishing on Commission.

A New Enterprise

THE newest name to be added to the long list of London publishers is that of Mr. R. A. Everett, who is beginning business in Essex-street. Mr. Everett has controlled some important publications when acting as manager to Messrs. Thacker & Company. In particular, he was concerned in bringing out an édition-de-luxe of Whyte-Melville's works, and the well-known books on horses and sport by Captain Hayes, whose works he will in future publish. Mr. Everett will adopt a method of publishing which he believes is well suited to the present state of the book market. This is publishing on commission, whereby the author retains his copyright and the maximum of control and oversight over his books. Under this system the author takes all the profits after the cost of production has been met, less small commissions on the cost and sales. Throughout, the publisher acts as the author's agent, and the publisher's operations and his account books are open to the author's inspection.

Publishing on commission seems peculiarly adapted to superior technical books enjoying a long sale, but it will probably meet the wishes of authors of all kinds. To the new and timid writer it should appeal by its simplicity and openness. He will know at the outset precisely what his risks are, and what his chances of profit; moreover, the publisher's gains, like his own, will be regulated entirely by the success of the book in question. But Mr. Everett anticipates that his system will be appreciated by many older writers who desire to have more direct control over their literary business and a clearer financial method. It does not follow, of course, that Mr. Everett will not use other methods of publishing where such are preferred.

The only prejudice, if there be one, against publishing on commission arises from the notion that the system opens wide the door to the incompetent writer who can pay to have his book produced. But clearly all depends on the publisher. Mr. Everett intends to publish good books, not bad books; and he will not permit his ideal of sound literary publishing to be spoilt by writers who have more money than brains.

How Long Should Copyright Last?

THIS question is naturally being raised at a time when a new Copyright Act is likely to become law. Under the existing law copyright in a book lasts the author's lifetime, or for forty-two years, whichever period proves the longer. By the new Act it is proposed to extend the period to the author's lifetime, plus thirty years. This is the German rule, but it seems a mistake to regard it as an "extension" in all cases. For, obviously, if an author should die one year after the publication of a book the copyright in that book will last only thirty-one years—i.e., eleven years less than the forty-two now assured to every book.

It may be noted that in France copyright lasts through the author's life, and for fifty years afterwards. In Italy and Spain copyright in a book survives its author by eighty years. In these countries, therefore, a good copyright remains a source of income to a man's children and grandchildren. What, then, is the true, the just period during which copyright should be upheld? Or should there be a period at all? Copyright in perpetuity may seem a startling proposition, but why should a book not be regarded as a piece of property as real, and as inalienable from an author's heirs, as a house, or a mine, or a fishery? The question is at least worth considering.

That hardship results from the present speedy termination of copyrights can hardly be disputed. It is easy, indeed, to name cases in which the extinction of copyright has been an injustice, or at least a matter for regret. Some forty years ago the grandson of Daniel Defoe was found to be an inmate of Kennington Union, and a public subscription, initiated by Walter Savage Landor, was raised on his behalf. Surely the grandson of the author of Robinson Crusoe had a moral claim to the benefits of his grandfather's success. Or take a gigantic work like Cruden's Concordance. Cruden, we believe, was a bachelor, but he might have left a family to whom the royalties on his great work would have been a help both welcome and just. One could find a score of books of reference on the "open shelves" on the British Museum Reading-room which under a more liberal law of copyright would now be yielding more or less useful incomes to the descendants of hard-worked men of erudition and genius. As Mr. Lang says in the current Longman's Magazine:

Think how Scott, his debts paid, would have provided for his family had copyright lasted longer. The heirs of Keats and Coleridge, men neglected by purchasers in their day, would have been bequeathed a competence. Most of Dickens's works are now out of copyright—a real hardship while an author's sons and daughters are in the land. Surely copyright might be protected "for two lives" at least. The authors literally "created" the property which, in their lifetime, many of them did not enjoy. If we are to have property at all, the author's property ought to be the most, not the least, sacred.

At the present time a number of copyrights are falling into the hands of enterprising publishers who have only such claims to them as the general copyright law of the country gives them. Lord Tennyson's family may not be conspicuously in need of the royalties which have just lapsed, yet the rights of the well-to-do are scarcely less worthy of respect than the needs of the poor; and the continuance of the Tennyson copyrights would at least have saved us from the shoddy editions of his poems which are now being thrown before the public.

Even in fiction—where change and decay proceed so fast—the operation of the forty-two years' system seems to bear hardly on descendants. The heirs of Scott, Dickens, and Thackeray would still be enjoying a harvest of royalties if our copyright law were that of Spain. And, as the Author points out, there are always cases ahead. The heirs of Charles Reade, George Eliot, and Robert Louis Stevenson will soon lose what it is quite permissible to think they ought to be allowed to keep.

It is significant that in the United States a definite movement is on foot to substitute perpetual for limited copyright. Sir Walter Besant, in the Author, boldly supports this change, though he is careful to point out some of the obstacles to its realisation. He considers that the running out of copyright is a great hardship and a great injustice:

But it will prove most difficult to persuade people of its injustice. . . . People have got firmly fixed in their heads the notion that if the term copyright is indefinitely extended certain books, now, as they are pleased to call it, the property of the nation—really the property of competing publishers—will be suppressed. "Suppose," they say, "The Pilgrim's Progress were to fall into the hands of a Catholic?" The true answer would be, that the fact of this work being always in demand, and that it was a property like a coal mine, would effectually prevent that property being ruined or destroyed.

Another objection to the extension of copyright is the fact that publishers are always trying to get copyright in their own hands. The agreements submitted to authors always demand copyright or the exclusive right of publication during the time of copyright; or if they buy a book outright of course copyright goes with it. Therefore an extension of copyright would only mean the continuance during such extension of the agreement made with the author. And this, as the "Draft Agreements" (Equitable show, would leave the author, as a rule, very little cause for congratulation as to the benefits of the extension. Now, people very rightly think that they would rather have the competing publisher than the publisher who is sole owner.

To meet the last objection, Sir Walter proposes that purchase of copyright should be limited to periods of five or six years. "Most books suffer painless extinction after the first year; a few last for three or four years; very few, indeed, are in demand more than five years. For those books which have the good fortune of extended life, it is surely fair to the creator of the property that there should be a fresh deal." Of the general justice of the outcry for longer copyright Sir Walter has no doubt. "The term of copyright," he says, "should be certainly extended—perhaps there should be no term at all—the State does not take away a man's coal mine after forty years."

Our own opinion is that the term of copyright proposed by the new Act is not long enough, and that now is the time for those authors who are alive to their own and their brothers' interests to determine, by debate and inquiry, what is the proper length of time to adopt.

Memoirs of the Moment.

IN Vienna this week has died the Baroness Ulrika von Levetzow, referred to as "a friend and contemporary of Goethe." A friend certainly—the word might be a warmer one to represent the adoration she gave to Goethe and had from him. A contemporary she was, although there was a great disparity of years between her and Goethe. The Baroness was, in fact, not yet twenty when Goethe, aged seventy-four, met her at Marienbad, and found himself still young enough to fall in love with her, as she fell in love with him. The exaltation of the Werther period he felt over again, and he began to discover that a man who was never too old to be a lover was never too old to be a poet. Marriage was mooted; but the representations of friends—perhaps a fear of ridicule—withheld him from the altar. He tore himself away from the fair; and the "Marienbad Elegy" which he wrote in the carriage as it put the miles between them remains as a token of his inexhaustible resources of feeling and of the cost at which he did violence to his sentiments. All these years since his death—seventy—the Baroness has borne the same name and the recollection of the greatly-worshipping Goethe.

No one lives any longer now to recall the kisses and the tears of the author of Faust. Friendships with women can scarce be written of; yet Goethe's friendships might have made a chapter to which the pen of G. H. Lewes, at its nimblest, had done little injustice. Goethe himself wrote as he could of the many women he ranked among his close friends. Like most young men, he found his first heroine in a woman of an older generation, Fräulein Von Klettenberg, the "fair saint" who taught him the mysticism which led him on to Faust, from that unlikely starting-point, the Imitation of Christ, through the works of the alchemists. He was then a medical student in Strasburg, and he had a dancing-master, the dancing-master had two daughters, and that meant for Goethe two love-affairs. The dramatic end came (at any rate, in Goethe's Autobiography) when one of the sisters, in the presence of the other, caught Goethe by the hair, crying: "Woe upon woe for ever and ever to her who for the first time after me kisses these lips!"

GOETHE left the house without giving the listening sister the occasion to fear the curse; but the memory of it haunted him when, a little later, he lost his heart to Frederika Brion, the daughter of a pastor, to whom, after a few days' visit to her people, he writes a vague love-letter; and, returning unannounced, finds his coming that day had been anticipated—a scene which has a parallel when Contarini Fleming is greeted by his future bride, at first meeting, with the words: "You have been long expected." No wonder that Goethe, when he read that romance, delighted Disraeli the younger with his praise. The ideal of Stevenson might be "beauty, touched with sex and laughter." For Goethe and for Disraeli there must be an added touch of mysticism. When Goethe left Frederika the second time, having braved the curse, he met on his homeward way a phantom of himself and remarked the ghostly figure's trappings, recalled to him eight years later when he rode in that very attire to revisit the girl and to suffer disillusion.

If Lord Rosebery's Bath speech tempted one to a quotation from a letter of Landor's, his speech about Cromwell seems to cry out irresistibly for a quotation from Mr. Abraham Cowley. If the passage—not in poetry, but in prose—is unfamiliar to Lord Rosebery he will welcome it, despite the sentiments it expresses, for a stupendous piece of rhetoric:

What can be more extraordinary, wicked than for a person to endeavour not only to exalt himself above, but to trample upon, all his equals and betters? to pretend freedom for all men, and under the help of that pretence to make all men his servants? to take arms against taxes of scarce two hundred thousand pounds a year, and to raise them himself above two millions? to quarrel for the loss of three or four ears, and to strike off three or four hundred heads? to fight against an imaginary suspicion of I know not what, two thousand guards to be fetched for the king, I know not from whence, and to keep up for himself no less than forty thousand? to pretend the defence of Parliaments, and violently to dissolve all even of his own calling, and almost choosing? to undertake the reformation of religion, to rob it even to the very skin, and then to expose it naked to the rage of all sects and heresies? to set up councils of rapine, and courts of murder? to fight against the king under a commission for him? to take him forcibly out of the hands of those for whom he had conquered him? to draw him into his net, with protestations and vows of fidelity, and when he had caught him in it to butcher him with as little shame as conscience, or humanity, in the open face of the whole world? to receive a commission for king and parliament, to murder (as I said) the one, and destroy no less impudently the other? to fight against monarchy when he declared for it, and declare against it, when he contrived for it in his own person? to abuse perfidiously, and supplant ingratiously his own general first, and afterwards most of those officers, who with the loss of their honour, and the hazard of their souls, had lifted him up to the top of his unreasonable ambitions? to break his faith with all enemies, and with all friends equally? and to make no less frequent use of the most solemn perjuries than the loose sort of people do with customary oaths? to usurp three kingdoms without the shadow of the least pretensions, and to govern them as unjustly as he got them? to set himself up as an idol (which we know, as St. Paul says, in itself is nothing), and make the very streets of London like the valley of Hinnom, by burning the bowels of men as a sacrifice to his Moloch-ship? to seek to entail this usurpation upon his posterity, and with it an endless war upon the nation? and lastly, by the severest judgment of Almighty God, to die HARDENED, and MAD, and UNREPENTANT, with the CURSES of the present age, and the DETESTATION of all to succeed?

The capitals are Mr. Cowley's own.

He had with his own hand written these verses [the "Marienbad Elegy"] in Roman characters on fine vellum paper, and fastened them with a silken cord into a red morocco case; so that, from the outside, it was obvious that he prized this manuscript above all the rest.

From Eckermann's "Conversations of Goethe."

Correspondence.

Miss Swanwick.

SIR,—In "Memoirs of the Moment" your correspondent writes without sympathy of dear old Miss Swanwick, kindest of hostesses, most erudite of women. If Tennyson did not "haunt" her drawing-room, he at least gave a special reading of "Maud" for her—a little intime reading in his own house and with otherwise only his family present. Miss Swanwick would have been the last to boast of her friendship with the great men of her generation. They did her honour in their own way. Tennyson was never gruff to her. Browning confided to her that "Luria" was his favourite of his poems. Martineau and Gladstone brought her their portraits and sent her their books; and that they did so could be no surprise to those who really knew her, for a more charmingly sympathetic woman never lived. After the casualness, the ungraciousness, the ungracefulness of the ordinary London hostess, who that has ever been in the Cumberland-terrace drawing-room will forget the welcome given them by the little old lady in her grey shawl? You, though quite insignificant, were given the seat of honour on the sofa by herself, and she would sit affectionately holding your hand, sympathetically asking after your small concerns, blithely telling of some special little kindness done to herself, until your heart warmed and warmed to her. And at her kindly hearth the great and the little foregathered. On the same afternoon, you met Lord Bute and the journalist who was beginning her career—the dweller in the attic and the great statesman! They met on the common ground of dear old Miss Anna Swanwick's love of human kind.—I am, &c.,

A Pocket Stevenson.

SIR,—Now that pocket editions are to be had by the score, surely it is somewhat strange that we have none of Robert Louis Stevenson. I have attentively searched the season's lists of new editions, but have met with the usual disappointment. Stevenson is so essentially the friend of youth, the companion of all who love the country, that I am astonished no demand has yet been raised for such an edition. For myself, I never travel without some volume of his essays, and like always to have him ready to my hand. Are not Virginibus Puerisque, Memories and Portraits, Across the Plains, and The Inland Voyage books imprimis for the pocket?

The publication of these volumes in some such form as the "Temple Classics" would surely bring a profit to the publishers.—I am, &c.,

George Cupples or William Hansard?

SIR,—In your issue of November 4 you reviewed A Spliced Yarn, by George Cupples (Gibbings & Co., 5s.), and quoted a passage telling how Bill Bullen's "old frigate came tumbling home, and how he took his farewell of the sea." The passage which pleased your reviewer had to me a familiar ring, and you will find it verbatim on p. 267 of the bound volume of Good Words for 1862, edited by the late Dr. Norman Macleod. It occurs in an article entitled "What Sent Me to Sea," over the signature of William Hansard. Unless Mr. George Cupples contributed to Good Words in 1862 over the name "George Hansard," some explanation of this literary coincidence seems due.—I am, &c.,

Mr. Henty's Books.

SIR,—Owing to a press of work it is only to-day that I have seen the letter of Messrs. S. W. Partridge & Co. I am astonished at their statement that "they had not to their knowledge received or heard anything of a protest from Mr. Henty." Their memories must indeed be short ones. They wrote to me saying that they had purchased my novel A Woman of the Commune, and intended to bring it out under a new name, but that as a matter of courtesy only they asked my approval of the change. I replied that on principle I objected most strongly to any change of title, as it was calculated to deceive the public, who would naturally suppose that it was a new book. I received no answer to that letter.—I am, &c.,

Our Prize Competitions.

Result of No. 8 (New Series).

THIS competition was set in the following terms:

The conversation at a certain house the other evening turned upon the amount of significance which some poets—notably Shakespeare—have crowded into a single line. One speaker instanced:

Child Rowland to the dark tower came, from King Lear; but that line is mysterious and romantic rather than surcharged with matter. A better example is in the porter's speech in Macbeth, where he says: "I had thought to let in some of the old professions, that go the primrose way to the everlasting bonfire." This, properly speaking, is prose; but it illustrates our point. We offer, then, a prize of a guinea for that line chosen from English poets, living or dead, which is most packed with meaning.

Among the many lines which have reached us we consider the one most packed with meaning to be this, from Browning's "Rabbi Ben Ezra":

Time's wheel runs back or stops: Potter and clay endure, which was sent by E. Hoffmann, "Fair View," Didsbury.

A choice from the best lines follows. The asterisks mean that more than one person has chosen the quotation:

The adventurous sun took Heaven by storm,
Clouds scattered largesses of rain,
The sounding cities, rich and warm,
Smouldered and glittered in the plain.

To Mr. Anderson a cheque has been posted.

Competition No. 9 (New Series).

In the Letters of Robert Louis Stevenson, which are reviewed elsewhere in this number, is a letter from Stevenson to Mr. Henley in which he enumerates several non-existent literary treasures that he would much like to discover. Among these is a fragment of Shakespeare's Autobiography and a portion of an unfinished novel by Henry Fielding, entitled Solomon Crabb. In his letter Stevenson, by a fine effort of improvisation, dashed into an abstract of this imaginary work. Thus:

"I am enjoying Solomon Crabb extremely; Solomon's capital adventure with the two highwaymen and Squire Trecothick and Parson Vance; it is as good, I think, as anything in Joseph Andrews. I have just come to the part where the highwayman with the black patch over his eye has tricked poor Solomon into his place, and the squire and the parson are hearing the evidence. Parson Vance is splendid. How good, too, is old Mrs. Crabb and the coastguardman in the third chapter, or her delightful quarrel with the sexton of Seaham; Lord Conybeare is, surely, a little overdone; but I don't know either; he's such damned fine sport. Do you like Sally Barnes? I'm in love with her. Constable Muddon is as good as Dogberry and Verges put together; when he takes Solomon to the cage, and the highwayman gives him Solomon's own guinea for his pains, and kisses Mrs. Muddon, and just then up drives Lord Conybeare, and instead of helping Solomon, calls him all the rascals in Christendom—O, Henry Fielding, Henry Fielding! Yet perhaps the scenes at Seaham are the best. But I'm bewildered among all these excellences."

We ask our readers this week to indulge in a similar feat of fancy and imagine themselves to be reading a newly-discovered story, or fragment of a story, by Jane Austen. For the most convincing abstract, more or less in the manner of the above extract, not exceeding 250 words, we offer a prize of a guinea.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, November 21. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the second column of p. 584 or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers.

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

THE HISTORY OF LORD LYTTON'S INDIAN ADMINISTRATION.

BY LADY BETTY BALFOUR.

This is a family and official record, forming rather a history than a biography. It does not deal with Lord Lytton's personal life in India, but with his acts and opinions. Lady Betty Balfour has aimed at an impartiality which should not revive "the virulent party bitterness which perverted so much of the criticism on Lord Lytton's policy eighteen years ago, and which to this day has prevented it from receiving any measure of fair play." (Longmans. 18s.)

A HISTORY OF THE BRITISH ARMY.

BY THE HON. J. W. FORTESCUE.

This is a civilian's history of the British Army, written to fill a gap which no military writer has filled. The author's design is to bring the story down to the year 1870. The two volumes before us reach 1763, and two volumes will follow. Details of an antiquarian kind relating to dress, armament, and equipments are intentionally sacrificed to larger matters. (Macmillan & Co. 2 vols. 36s. net.)

THE TRANSVAAL AND THE BOERS.

BY W. E. GARRETT FISHER.

The earlier portions of this work appeared in 1896 under the above title, but they have been re-written, and the book is practically a new attempt to relate the history of the South African Republic and the Orange Free State, before they "pass out of independent existence." (Chapman & Hall. 10s. 6d.)

MEMOIRS OF A REVOLUTIONIST.

BY P. KROPOTKIN.

From the preface by George Brandes: "The author of the autobiography before us is not preoccupied with his own capacities. . . . He is more anxious to give the psychology of his contemporaries than of himself; and one finds in his book the psychology of Russia: the official Russia and the masses underneath—Russia struggling forward and Russia stagnant." (Smith, Elder & Co. 2 vols. 21s.)

LAMB AND HAZLITT. EDITED BY WILLIAM CAREW HAZLITT.

Into this slim volume Mr. Hazlitt has put the information derived from a number of hitherto unpublished letters and documents relating to his grandfather, the essayist and critic. One item in the book, "A Curious Historiette," is a detailed account of the hoax played off on Hazlitt by Lamb and Joseph Hume when they circulated a report that Hazlitt had died by his own hand. The book fills up a few crannies in our knowledge of Hazlitt and Lamb. (Mathews. 4s. 6d. net.)

JANE AUSTEN.

BY WALTER HERRIES POLLOCK.

This is an essay in criticism rather than a biography. But Mr. Pollock takes up a few loose threads left by other biographers. His special work, however, is to relate Jane Austen's literary work to that of her contemporaries, Madame D'Arblay, Miss Edgeworth, Miss Ferrier, and others. (Longmans. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE LEWIS CARROLL

EDITED BY

PICTURE BOOK.

STUART DODGSON COLLINGWOOD.

A literary and pictorial aftermath. We have reproductions of Lewis Carroll's scattered pictures, some of the photographs he took in his study at Christ Church, also fragments of his "Curiosa Mathematica," Oxford skits, and what not. (Unwin. 6s.)

RALPH FITCH.

BY J. HORTON RYLEY.

The East India Company and its men of mark have been the subjects of many books; but an earlier enterprise, the Levant Company, which took its rise at the close of the sixteenth century, and its set of heroes, are in need of celebration. This book fills the gap, and is particularly concerned with the adventures of Ralph Fitch, who had travelled across India before our first trading expedition left Plymouth for the East Indies in 1591. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

GIOVANNI BELLINI.

BY ROGER E. FRY.

A careful monograph on the master. Mr. Fry has had valuable assistance from painters and professors in Italy, and his collection of illustrations is adequate. (Unicorn Press.)

GREEK TERRACOTTA STATUETTES.

BY C. A. HUTTON.

"So far, except in France, Greek statuettes have been chiefly treated from the archaeological standpoint, but the present publication is addressed to that wider public which, though not repelled by their archaeological interest, is mainly attracted by their æsthetic charm, and curious as to the circumstances under which they had their being, and the civilisation which they represent." The book is a slim quarto, well illustrated in colours from statuettes in the British Museum. (Seeley & Co. 7s. net.)

OLIVER CROMWELL: HIS LIFE

AND CHARACTER.

BY ARTHUR PATERSON.

Cromwell is a subject on which the last word will not be said for a long time. Mr. Paterson boldly follows "where Carlyle, Gardiner, and Firth have led." His object is pure biography: "to give a narrative of the personal life, aims, and motives of this great Englishman"; any "history of the time" has been avoided. (Nisbet & Co. 10s. net.)

EXPLORATIO EVANGELICA.

BY PERCY GARDNER.

A book for the thoughtful layman by a writer who has, in long years of quiet study, arrived at certain views in regard to the psychology and the history of religion, and who speaks for himself alone. In form it is a critical rather than a constructive treatise on the origin of Christianity; "it may perhaps be compared to the operations which precede construction . . . it is of the nature of Prolegomena." (Black. 15s.)

THE YANGTZE VALLEY AND BEYOND.

BY MRS. J. E. BISHOP (ISABELLA L. BIRD).

An important work by the author of Unbeaten Tracks in Japan. Mrs. Bishop has been led to write down her impressions of the Yangtze Valley by the political movements of the last two years. Her journeys in this region were taken in 1897. The book is profusely and admirably illustrated, and is dedicated by permission to Lord Salisbury. (Murray. 21s. net.)

In addition to the above we have received:

"If this dictionary is anything, it represents without fear and without favour the actual truth, so far as it is known at present.... We doubt whether any encyclopædia of the Bible, whether English or foreign, is so full of new and solidly built up material relating to the Bible."—British Weekly.

"In every important respect, apart from questions of opinion, it must be pronounced vastly superior to any existing dictionary of the Bible."—Birmingham Post.

"We foresee that the encyclopædia will be an indispensable aid to the scholarly study of the Bible. Nowhere else can the student find such a complete apparatus of criticism for every department of his work."—Manchester Guardian.

"Of its immense and permanent value there can be no question."—St. James's Gazette.

THE LATEST BIBLE DICTIONARY.

"Whatever, however, may be the verdict of the future, there is no question that for the English Biblical student of to-day this work is one of unique value. It will be well for him in the interests of a full conspectus of points of view, to have others on his shelves, but he cannot afford to be without this."—Christian World.

"Some things may be said on the form, the references, and the general arrangements of the dictionary. But these are so elaborately explained by the editors, and are so luminous, that we need not spend time in explaining them. They are a triumph of wise adaptation of means to ends, they save time, space, and labour, and they greatly enhance the usefulness of the dictionary. As to the contents of the dictionary we need not say that they are able, scholarly, and instructive in the highest degree.... much more might be said on this notable addition to the books which help us in our study of the Bible. There is no topic of the Bible left untouched, every name and every place and everything mentioned in the Bible has received attention, and the work is of the highest order. While we do not take the same attitude towards many subjects which is taken by the editors and contributors of this dictionary, we gladly acknowledge the reverence of the treatment bestowed on Biblical topics, the thoroughness of the scholarship, the exactness of the knowledge, the breadth of information, and the earnestness of the labour of all concerned in the production of this great work."—Aberdeen Free Press.

The Literary Week.

ON another page of this number will be found an article wherein the novelty of the two stories of Dumas, The Snow on Shah-Dagh and Ammalat Bey, which have just been issued as newly-discovered fruits of his genius, is shown to be non-existent. Both are included in his works and are familiar to specialists in Dumas. We make the statement with some reluctance, because both M. Apostolides (the possessor of the MSS.) and Mr. Home Gordon (the translator) have clearly been to much trouble in laying their book before English readers; but they did not, of course, take such pains as were necessary, or the mistake could never have been carried so far. A large amount of blame seems to rest with the house of Calmann-Lévy, which certainly should know all the stories of Dumas that it publishes.

CONSIDERABLE interest has been taken in the article on the duration of Copyright which we printed last week. We shall return to the question in our next issue.

MR. STEPHEN PHILLIPS'S tragedy, "Paolo and Francesca," is, we are glad to note, one step nearer production. Last week Mr. George Alexander gave a performance of it at Liverpool for copyright purposes.

THE prices for early editions of Mr. Kipling's writings still keep very high. At Sotheby's, this week, the following books and papers were sold: "The Seven Nights of Creation," a poem on four pages, privately printed, without date or place of printing, £13 15s. (Denham); three copies of Schoolboy Lyrics, 1881, realised £29, £41, and £46 respectively; Echoes, by Two Writers, 1884, £18 (Denham); Departmental Ditties, 1886, inscribed "The Common Room, U.S. College, with the compliments of the author," £18 10s. (A. H. Walker); the Week's News, published at Allahabad, a set from January 7 to September 16, 1888, complete with the exception of three numbers—each number of this paper containing a complete story by Mr. Kipling, some of which have never been reprinted—£20 (Denham); and "Turnovers" from the Civil and Military Gazette, January to June, 1888, £10 15s. (Cordeant). The buyer of the copy of Departmental Ditties is the present Head Master of the United Services College at Westward Ho! It seems hard that the book should ever have found its way from the Common Room of the school to Sotheby's. Mr. Walker showed genuine zeal to win it back again.

FROM the same sale, which included a number of rare editions and autographs of Dickens, there was a notable absentee in the person of Mr. W. R. Hughes, whose death is just announced. Mr. Hughes, who was the Birmingham City Treasurer, was an indefatigable collector of Dickens. He had a vast number of editions of the works, he had furniture from Gadshill, and a host of portraits and other mementoes of the novelist. Mr. Hughes was also a devoted admirer of Mr. Herbert Spencer. These two cults—of the author of Pickwick and of the author of the Synthetic Philosophy—are rarely carried on side by side.

THE second volume of Mr. Herbert Spencer's revised and enlarged edition of the Principles of Biology is on the eve of issue.

MR. M. H. SPIELMANN'S researches in old volumes of Punch for fugitive Thackerayana (to which we shall return later) is not the only book of its kind. Mr. W. T. Spencer, of Oxford-street, the specialist in Cruikshank and early Victorian authors and illustrators, has just issued in a limited edition a similar collection of Thackeray's contributions to the National Standard and the Constitutional. He calls the work The New Thackeray Book.

WE regret to have to announce the impending resignation of Mr. Hugh Chisholm from the editorship of the St. James's Gazette. Mr. Chisholm, after eight years' service to the paper as assistant editor and editor, is leaving at the end of the year. His successor has not yet been appointed.

THE tendency of authors, working independently, to duplicate each other's work, and to do it at the same time, has often enough been commented upon. It is illustrated again by the announcement that Prof. Goldwin Smith has just completed a book entitled Shakespeare, the Man, which is described as an attempt to discover the character of the dramatist from passages in the plays and poems. No reader of the Saturday Review before its last change of proprietorship will need to be reminded that a similar task was carried out by Mr. Frank Harris, whose volume on the subject, consisting of these Saturday essays and others, is about to be published by Mr. Heinemann. Shakespearean students, however, in the present case need have no feeling except pleasure, for both studies, however much they may differ, are certain to be shrewd and interesting.

AN "occ. poet" in the Pall Mall Gazette thus sweepingly disposes of the children's books of the present season:

He thought he saw a flock of owls
That made a dismal noise:
He looked again, and found it was More books for girls and boys:
"Treacle in print," he said, "and oh!
How soon that diet cloy!"

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "It pleased me, as an Anglo-Indian, to know that last week's prize [in Competition No. 7] was won by a native of India. And perhaps you will let me say that the ACADEMY is much read by busy officials in India, to whom it is necessarily much more interesting than to people who have bookshops at every corner and Mudie's libraries besides. For most Indian people can only get books by post, and have reason to bless the invention of the cheap (and light) colonial editions which now emulate Tauchnitz."

MR. SHORTER'S new paper, the first number of which is to be published in January, is employing at this moment no fewer than four draughtsmen at the war—Mr. Wollen, Mr. Prater, and two others.

THE little sheaf of lyrics which Mr. Henley contributes to the North American Review have the blackbird note of the boxwood flute, to use his own phrase. "Hawthorn and Lavender: Songs and Madrigals" they are prettily called, and the feeling is the feeling of the "Echoes" in his Book of Verses. There is nothing with the matchless music of

Coming up from Richmond
On the way to Kew;

but only Mr. Henley could have written them, and the new environment of the poet—Worthing, in Sussex, with the Channel before him and the South Downs at the back—gives them a definite character. We quote three of the twenty-five numbers:

I.

The good South-west, on wreck-worn wings,
Comes shepherding the good rain;
The brave sea breaks, and glooms, and swings,
A wavering, gleaming plain.
Sound, sea of England, sound and shine,
Blow, English wind, amain,
Till in this old, gray heart of mine
The spring need wake again!

II.

The April sky sags low and drear,
The April winds blow cold,
The April rains fall gray and sheer,
And yearlings keep the fold.
But the rook has built, and the thrushes throng,
And over the faded lea
The sky-lark scatters his rocketing song;
And he is the bird for me!
For he sings as if, from his watchman's height,
He saw, this blighting day,
The far vales break into colour and light
From the banners and arms of May.

III.

The west a glory of green and red and gold,
The magical drifts to north and eastward rolled,
The shining sands, the still, transfigured sea,
The wind so light it scarce begins to be,
As these long days unfold a flower, unfold
Life's rose in me.

Life's rose—life's rose! Red at my heart it glows—
Glow and is glad, as in some quiet close
The sun's spoiled darlings their gay life renew!
Only, the clement rain, the mothering dew,
Daytime and night, all things that make the rose,
Are you, dear, you!

MR. HENLEY's dedication of Hoby's Courtier, the immediately forthcoming volume in his series of Tudor Translations, is as follows:

TO
GEORGE WYNDHAM,
SOLDIER, COURTIER, SCHOLAR, IN A YEAR OF HIGH EMOTION
AND THE ACCOMPLISHING OF AUGUST DESTINIES,
THIS TREATISE OF AMENITY IN ACT,
THIS OLD-FACED
YET EVER LUSTROUS MIRROR
OF THE
COMPLETE GENTLEMAN.

Urquhart's Rabelais was to have been issued at the same time as Hoby's Courtier, but the editor, Mr. Whibley, has found it necessary considerably to extend the scope of his Introduction, and this has caused delay. The three volumes are, however, almost out of the editor's hands.

MR. HENLEY, by the way, has been invited to be present at the annual dinner of the Edinburgh Burns Club, and propose the poet's health. He cannot accept the invitation, but the fact that it has been sent to him shows that all Scotland did not lose its head over his vigorous and right-minded Essay.

IN the Atlantic Monthly is an interesting budget of letters from Turgenev to Stassov, written for the most part in the seventies. They are concerned chiefly with musical, artistic, and literary criticism, and they show Turgenev's independence of judgment and refusal to be coerced to depart a hairsbreadth from his own belief. We do not get the impression that Stassov, who is still living, was a correspondent quite worthy of him. Vladimir Vassilievich Stassov, who is the son of a famous Russian architect, was Director of Fine Arts at the Imperial Public Library, and has been a busy writer and worker in the same field all his life. He describes how he first met Turgenev in 1865:

Turgenev came late, and, on entering the room, he paused to explain to a lady sitting near me the reason of his unpunctuality. "I have just been hearing Schumann's quintet for the first time. . . . My soul is all aglow," he said, in his soft, tender voice, which had a slightly sibilant note in it. I turned, and saw for the first time in my life Turgenev's tall and stately though somewhat stooping figure, his head with the heavy mane of hair, as yet untouched by gray, and his kind, rather dim eyes.

We give some extracts from the letters:

Every day it grows harder to satisfy one's self with one's art. For instance, I have only just finished a long novel for the Messenger de l'Europe [probably Fathers and Sons], which I re-wrote three times; mine is a kind of labour of Sisyphus!

Of all these "young" Russian musicians, only two have decided talent—Tchaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakov. All the rest, for what they are worth, may be put in a sack and thrown into the water! Not, of course, as men—as men they are charming—but as artists.

I may be mistaken in my judgment of the new Russian art, and you are fully justified in reproaching me for my ignorance or want of comprehension; but why should you imagine that I speak thus not from a strong personal conviction or sentiment, but because I bow down before the authority of foreigners? What devil should induce me, an old man—who have never in my whole life valued anything as highly as my own independence—to bow down or kowtow to these authorities?

Never, never did it enter into my head to accuse Repin of audacity. Why, good heavens, it is precisely from the absence of such audacity that our half-baked talents are suffering. He is a poor creature; there is the misfortune. Had he been a good fellow, he might have abused whom he pleased.

I do not ascribe any importance to Théophile Gautier as a poet. . . . I have read the new articles by Victor Hugo. I regret that I do not possess sufficient powers of expression to tell to what a degree I despise these articles, and the whole of his prose in general.

TURGENEV's deliberate and adverse opinion of Sarah Bernhardt's genius, delivered in 1882, is very interesting:

This woman is clever and skilful; she has her business at her finger ends, is gifted with a charming voice and educated in a good school; but she has nothing natural about her, no artistic temperament whatever, and she tries to make up for this by Parisian licentiousness. She is eaten through and through with chic, réclame, and pose. She is monotonous, cold, and dry; in short, without a single spark of talent in the highest sense of the word. Her gait is that of a hen; she has no play of features; the movements of her hands are purposely angular, in order to be piquant; the whole thing reeks of the boulevards, of Figaro and patchouli. . . . You must allow me to quote Augier, who once said to me: "Cette femme n'a aucun talent; on dit d'elle que c'est un paquet de nerfs—c'est un paquet de ficelles." But you will ask, Why then such a world-wide reputation? What do I care? I only speak my own feelings, and I am glad to find somebody who supports my view.

Subsequently Stassov wrote: "Turgenev, a great writer, was, as might be expected from a Russian, realistic and sincere in his own novels and tales; but in his tastes and views of art his cosmopolitanism made him the enemy of realism and sincerity in others. In such ideas and in such unaccountable prejudices he elected to spend his whole life."

THE recently published Memoirs of Victor Hugo reminds me (writes a correspondent) of the fact that the reading-world still awaits the publication of the further volume, or volumes, of the Letters of Victor Hugo, translated by Mr. F. Clarke. The house of Methuen issued the first volume (1815 to 1835) three years ago, since which time we have no intimation of the continuance of the work.

LAST week we gave a picture of Cunzie House, Anstruther, Stevenson's home for part of 1868. This is the wording of the tablet that has been erected on the house: "Robert Louis Stevenson lived in this house in the summer of 1868.

Not one quick beat of your warm heart,
Nor thought that came to you apart,
Pleasure nor pity, love nor pain,
Nor sorrow has gone by in vain."

The tablet is the design of Mr. R. S. Lorimer, A.R.I.B.A.

Two weeks ago we gave a brief account of the new American drama which has been based on the very slight foundation of Whittier's war ballad, "Barbara Frietchie." Barbara Frietchie, as no one needs to be reminded, was an old woman, but, for the sake of the interest of the play, the dramatist has made her young. We return to the subject in order to give this week, merely as a curiosity, a portrait of Miss Julia Arthur in the title-rôle.

MISS JULIA ARTHUR AS BARBARA FRIETCHIE.

WE have been favoured with a copy of some correspondence that has recently passed between Mr. Ignatius Donnelly and the Shakespeare Press, New Jersey. As an exercise in outspoken criticism it is of value. The Shakespeare Press seems to have written to the author of The Great Cryptogram to ask for information concerning his forthcoming book. Mr. Donnelly conceived the request to be for an advance copy, in order that the director of the Shakespeare Press, Dr. Appleton Morgan, might "leap upon it as soon as it is ushered into the world, and damn it before the public can have time to read it." To this the Shakespeare Press replied: "Dr. Morgan cannot damn your book, Mr. Donnelly. That operation can only be performed by yourself." The justification of Dr. Appleton Morgan follows.

A CORRESPONDENT quotes from the European Magazine, 1790, the following account of a contemporary sale of Shakespeare editions. Few things can have so risen in value. "The collection of Shakespeare's plays, 1623 (commonly called the First Folio), was sold at Mr. Egerton's auction room for no less a sum than £35 14s. The Dukes of Grafton and Roxburghe were the competitors for this volume. The latter was victorious. At the same sale, Romeo and Juliet, 4to, 1599, was purchased for £7 15s., and Hamlet, 4to, 1604, for £17 6s. 6d. A three-guinea subscription receipt for Alderman Boydell's Shakespeare was likewise disposed of, at the same time and place, for £6 8s."

THE last pages of Munsey's Magazine are distinguished by Literary Notes of a particularly piquant nature, relating, it is true, more to American authors than to English, but dealing with some books that have vogue also in this country. Among these notes we find, in the November number, a series of parodies of popular writers, where Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler's epigrammatic excursions are thus lightly touched off:

A DRAWING-ROOM CONVERSATION.

BY ELLYN THORNEYCROFT FOWLER.

Lord Steeplecrown thoughtfully stirred his tea.

"So Winnie Flyter has succeeded in marrying her duke," he said.

"All's well that ends well," commented Lady Slivering-ton.

"A marriage without love is better than love without a carriage," added Pamela bitterly. "It's the accessories that make it possible to drag on through our days."

"Every drag on has his St. George," said Lord Steeplecrown gallantly. "Yours, my dear young lady, may be at this moment—ringing the doorbell."

"Well, if he is a complete blockhead, like my husband, let him in," advised Lady Slivering-ton. "When I don't like Slivering-ton's ways I merely have to hit him with a chair. He thinks it inadvertence, and is too polite to call my attention to it. But it mends his ways, if not the chairs."

"Charity begins at home," murmured Lord Steeplecrown.

"So does divorce," commented Pamela. "'Tis love that makes the world go wrong."

"Pamela is our cynic qua non," and Lady Slivering-ton smiled affectionately.

"Contention is better than riches," answered the girl. "There are moments when I hate the emptiness of luxury. Better a stale loaf and a knuckle of ham—"

"But many a nickel makes a knuckle," interposed Lord Steeplecrown. "Poverty is generally the emptiest state of all."

"Better M.P. than empty," said Lady Slivering-ton. "That's why I've put up with Slivering-ton all these years."

"Well, as the man said who stole a ride on a tramcar, none but the brave reserve their fare," said Pamela, rising to go. "My carriage is waiting."

"Hansom is as automobile does," said Lord Steeplecrown, rising also.

"Good-bye, my dear," said Lady Slivering-ton. "I'd keep you to dinner, but it's a wise child that knows its own larder." And she sank back among the cushions to refresh herself for the next callers by reviewing the tables, ten words make one epigram, ten epigrams make one wit, ten wits make one tired.

Munsey's is quite a gain to English bookstalls.

AMERICA is already well supplied with literary magazines, but another is now being projected. The Macmillan Company propose to issue their own particular rival to the Bookman, the Bookbuyer, and the Critic, to mention only these, in the shape of an unillustrated critical magazine, in which each department shall be in the hands of an expert. The lack of illustrations will be a change for which some readers, weary of portraits of popular novelists, may be grateful.

The author of McTeague, Mr. Frank Norris, is taking a leaf from M. Zola's book and adventuring upon a novel trilogy. The subject is wheat. Mr. Norris's first novel will deal with the Producer, the scene being California; the second with the Distributor, the scene being Chicago; and the third with the Consumer, the scene being England. The subject is immense, and it is greatly in the writer's favour that he should aim so high.

THOSE authors who indulge in the pastime of presenting Her Majesty with luxuriously bound copies of their works may be interested to know that Sir Arthur Bigge has recently written to a Scottish publisher stating that Her Majesty prefers to receive books in the binding in which they are published.

MR. H. G. WELLS's new story, Love and Mr. Lewisham, an exercise in the same genre as his Wheels of Chance, is appearing as a serial in the weekly edition of the Times.

THE third edition of the "London Letter" War Directory has just been issued. In this work, published by the London Letter Company, may be found 3,000 names of Naval and Military Officers and the Nursing Staff serving or requisitioned to serve in South Africa. Such officers who, up to date, have been killed, wounded, or taken prisoners are also mentioned.

Bibliographical.

A LONDON morning paper tells us that the thirtieth (and final) volume of the Centenary Edition of Carlyle's works will contain "some material almost to be called new"—namely, essays on Montaigne, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, Montesquieu, Necker, the two Pitts, and the Netherlands, contributed by Carlyle to the Edinburgh Encyclopædia. But have not these essays already been reprinted in volume form? Surely it was these early efforts which Mr. S. R. Crockett introduced to this generation of readers only two years ago, in a volume entitled Montaigne, and Other Essays by Thomas Carlyle? There cannot be much of Carlyle's published work which has not attained the distinction of print. The Lectures on the History of Literature, published seven years ago, were only reports of the discourses, not the discourses themselves. Much more valuable were the Historical Sketches of Notable Persons and Events in the Reigns of James I. and Charles I., which Mr. Alexander Carlyle edited and published last year. There is record of a volume of Rescued Essays by Thomas Carlyle, edited by Percy Newberry in 1892; but I have not seen it.

In the second volume of his Recollections (page 65) Sir Algernon West prints an epigram beginning "Froude informs the Scottish youth." The lines are familiar to most people, but not as Sir Algernon gives them. My readers may like to compare his version with the following, which was supplied to me by a well-known Church dignitary, and assuredly is superior in literary merit to that preserved by Sir Algernon:

Froude informs the Scottish youth
Parsons have small regard for truth;
The Reverend Canon Kingsley cries
That History is a pack of lies.
What cause for judgments so malign?
A brief reflection solves the mystery:
Froude believes Kingsley a divine,
And Kingsley goes to Froude for history.

The authorship of this excellent jeu d'esprit is well-known to many, but, so far as I am aware, it has never been put into print.

Taking up a volume by Mr. Harding Davis, entitled The Lion and the Unicorn, I find it consists of eight short stories, of which "The Lion and the Unicorn" is placed first in the book. This is the latest instance known to me of a practice which is becoming much too common. I have nothing to do here with the fact that that practice must needs mislead the readers of fiction, and be especially annoying to those who find they have ordered a book of short stories when they thought they were ordering a novel. My own complaint is that the habit adds to the labours of the bibliographer, who now can no longer trust to the title-page of a work of fiction, but must perforce also study the table of contents before he can describe the volume with the certainty of being accurate. Every book of short stories should be openly announced as such, both on the title-page and in advertisements.

There is plenty of room, I should say, for the concise critical Life of Defoe which Mr. Wilfred Whitten has prepared for the "Westminster" series of biographies. Of course, one does not forget the monograph on Defoe which William Minto wrote for the "English Men of Letters" series; but that was just twenty years ago. Since then we have had the volume by Mr. Thomas Wright, which may be described as halfway between the sketch by Mr. Minto and the elaborate pen-portrait produced ten years previously by Mr. William Lee. It is rather curious that Defoe should never have been included in the "Great Writers" series, which has left so few celebrities untouched. So it is, however; and Mr. Whitten's memoir, therefore, will supply something which is really wanted.

The appearance of a book by Mr. Baring Gould, entitled The Crock of Gold, necessarily reminds one of Mr. Martin Tupper's tale so named. The latter is fixed in my memory by the fact that Mr. Tupper was good enough to present to me a printed copy, marked "scarce," of the two-act melodrama which Edward Fitzball founded upon Mr. Tupper's story, and which was performed at the City of London Theatre a little more than half a century ago. "I never authorised, nor knew of, this dramatic version," Mr. Tupper wrote to me, "till long after it appeared." I need hardly say that, following the custom of the time, no acknowledgment of the original source of the play is to be found anywhere in the printed copy of it.

Mr. A. C. Benson, himself a poet, and owing something, I should say, to the influence of Matthew Arnold, has edited and "introduced" a selection from that writer's poems. The extent to which Arnold's poetry has interested the younger generation has already been illustrated not only by the popularity of the selection in the "Golden Treasury" series, but by the speed with which his non-copyright pieces were put upon the market by publishers other than Messrs. Macmillan. One of those publications was "introduced," it will be recollected, by Mr. William Sharp, and another by Dr. Richard Garnett. Nor must we forget the selections edited by Mr. G. C. Macaulay.

The new biography of Paul Jones, which Mr. James Barnes is to contribute to a well-known series, will be welcome, for, though this will be by no means the first memoir of the famous adventurer, the authoritative Lives—those by A. S. Mackenzie and W. G. Sims—are over fifty years old, Mackenzie's having come out in 1841 and Sims's in 1845. Of late years Jones has been made the hero of a comic opera, and has been impersonated by a lady. Mr. Barnes's book will be of service in rescuing Jones from the stage, and presenting him as an historical personage once more. How full of incident and variety his career was I need not say.

How persistently popular are Washington Irving's "Rip Van Winkle" and "Legend of Sleepy Hollow," an illustrated edition of which is soon to be before the public! The two tales were included last year in a collection of Little Masterpieces, published in London; and five years ago they were produced together in an illustrated form by Messrs. Macmillan. Separate illustrated editions of Rip Van Winkle appeared in 1886 and 1888—two in the latter year.

A Fleet of Song.

Satan Absolved. By Wilfrid Seawen Blunt. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

MR. WILFRID BLUNT'S latest poem, so far as it can be assigned to a category, might be called a satirical drama; but the satire is wholly serious and mirthless, replete with invective, and more misanthropic than Swift. It is inspired by indignation (justifiable enough) at the present Nimrod-like state of Christendom in general, and Anglo-Saxondom in particular: though (for our part) we think Russia is fairly on an equality with the Anglo-Saxon nations. This is embodied in a boldly original, not to say violent, conception. The action is laid wholly in Heaven, deriving manifest suggestions from Job, the prologue of Goethe's Faust, and Byron's Vision of Judgment. It is an onslaught on humanity, out-Swifiting Swift. We are introduced to a deity with regard to whom we need observe no capital letters in our relatives. For he is not the Christian Deity. He is not omniscient, being dependent for knowledge of the earth upon angelic report, which observes a most courtier-like deference to his preconceptions, and keeps him ignorant of the truth with regard to human affairs. He is less in his attributes even than the pagan Jove. With him Satan (a more than Marie-Corellian Satan) obtains a private interview, and exposes the actual state of mankind. Not only mankind, he represents, but the Redemption is a failure. And he proposes a new redemption. He will himself become incarnate, as an insect, the least of human things, redeeming the world through the appeal of weakness and beauty, leaving mankind to shift for itself as a hopeless failure. With the acceptance of this proposal the drama ends.

Obviously, there is matter for offence in this conception. But we are concerned with it as a vehicle for rhetorical invective upon the present state of Europe. We are concerned with its execution. It is avowedly rhetorical rather than poetical. Unfortunately, the rhetoric is weak, and by no means adequate to the startling conception. The language put into the mouth of the deity, where it is designed to be daring, is frequently ludicrous. There is no other word for it. Nor when we come to the stern invective, which is the main object of the poem, can it be pronounced equal to the strong and dignified invective of The Wind and the Whirlwind. Mr. Blunt has weighted himself with too great a scheme, where even Milton would have been encumbered. Here is a typical passage with regard to the traders among savages:

"Here are the goods we sell: cloth, firelocks, powder, rum. Ye shall go clothed like lords, like kings of Christendom."
"We are best naked." "Fie." "We have no use for arms, The fire-drink is forbid." "The thing forbid hath charms. Nay, we will make you men, soldiers to brawl and fight As all good Christians use, and God defend the right. The drink will give you courage. Take it. 'Tis the sign Of manhood orthodox, its sacramental wine, Or how can you be worthy your new Christian creed? Drink." And they drink to Jesus and are borne to bed.

This is at once violent and cheap. Such obvious incongruities (which with less platform-exaggeration would have been more effective) are not worthy of Mr. Blunt's powers. Violent conception with forced rather than forcible execution are the main defects, in fact, of this poem. Yet the evident sincerity of its feeling deserved a better fate, and better Mr. Blunt might have done had he contented himself with a less ambitious scheme.

Between Two Seas. By Violet Fane. (J. C. Nimmo.)

IN this volume, the lady who writes under the name of "Violet Fane" gives us a collection of very pretty verse. If never inspired, it is always dexterous and lit with colour; while it has a certain happy limpidity and absence of pretence, without poverty and cheapness of diction. Here and there is a poem with an idea, needing only less fluency and more compression to be striking. We might instance "A Deserted Palace," which becomes really impressive in accumulated effect. Were it but compacted it would gain much. We prefer to quote, because it is compacted, a brief little poem:

ON THE BOSPHORUS.

"Bathe not so near to my window-pane!"
The haughty lady cried,
But the bearded swimmer bore amain
As floating with the tide.

"Nay, get thee hence!" the lady said,
But little he seemed to reck:
Then a wave toss'd over the bearded head
And show'd her a sever'd neck!

The grim tale is well and effectively told. Lovers of light verse will find this agreeable volume to their mind.

The Apostle of the Ardennes. By Lady Lindsay. (Kegan Paul.)

LADY LINDSAY has given us some pleasing and, in certain cases, touching minor poems. But she has been ill-advised to venture on this long narrative in very nerveless blank verse. Frankly, the whole poem is diffuse and without grip. Rather than quote from the body of it, we will cite this incidental lyric:

Night hath fallen on my heart
Since I saw my queen depart—
(Vale, vale, Floriban!)

Kindle dawn and sunset burn!
She shall never more return—
(Vale, vale, Floriban!)

Nevermore, O nevermore!
She hath oped Death's iron door—
(Vale, vale, Floriban!)

Went she singing through the way,
As a bride on marriage day?
(Vale, vale, Floriban!)

Could ye not have held her close?
So the thorn-boughs shrine a rose—
(Vale, vale, Floriban!)

Ivy, yew, and cypress tree,
Weep for her and weep for me!
(Vale, vale, Floriban!)

Night hath fallen on my heart
Since I saw my queen depart—
(Vale, vale, Floriban!)

Vagrant Verses. By Rosa Mulholland. (Elkin Mathews.)

WE need not do more than notice the re-issue of these poems by the lady who was Miss Rosa Mulholland. All lovers of poetry should know the "St. Barbara" (the saint who was shut up by her father in a tower):

Girl, they have cut from 'neath thy dancing feet
Earth with her rose and lily,
Her violet and her light-winged daffodilly.
Stole from thine ear the sound of children singing;
The low of kine and pleasant sheep-bells ringing
Are silent to thee, sweet!

Yet thou hast company the clouds among,
 The birds' loud songs surround thee,
 The legions of the storm whirl round and round thee;
 The tranquil saints from their eternal places
 Look out and show thee their enraptured faces—
 The stars shine clear and long.

To such high company thy soul doth leap,
 The lark's wild hymn repeating,
 Flinging the tempest thine impassioned greeting,
 Watching the stars until thine eyes become
 A fire amidst them in the midnight gloom,
 No longer doomed to weep.

We have quoted only a part of this beautiful poem:
 there is more where it came from.

Selected Poems, Old and New. By Annie Matheson.
 (Henry Frowde.)

THESE poems are the work of a thoughtful individuality and a poetic mind. Under most of them is an idea (which is a great commendation), and the imagery is sometimes felicitous. The language lacks the inevitableness of the highest poetry, and it is here—in form generally—that we find the author's weakness. Nevertheless, it is work much above the level of the average minor poetry of the day. Here is a good example:

Oh, shall sweet roses scent the air,
 Although they hidden be,
 And yet my soul be unaware
 When thy soul dreams of me?
 And shall a rough wind hurt my cheek
 Because the sky is cold,
 Yet I not hear thy sorrow speak,
 Or feel thy joys unfold?
 Shall birds to find a land unknown
 Fly o'er the wintry sea,
 But thou not seek me, O my own,
 And I not trust in thee?

To all who care for quiet thought and sincerity we warmly recommend this book. It is a rare and welcome thing that a poet should really have something to say, and the author is seldom without it.

Pastorals, and Other Poems. By Elinor Sweetman.
 (J. M. Dent.)

Nor thought is the characteristic of Miss Sweetman's verse; but sense of form and diction it possesses in a high—indeed, a masculine degree. A rich feeling for natural beauty—and, indeed, beauty of every kind—runs through the book. If beautiful description were the chief end of poetry, Miss Sweetman's should take a high place; and a very conspicuous place among recent poetry we would assign it as it is. Take this as an extract:

All day from dawn to dusk a sound of axe
 Had rhymed with echo in the mountain-cleft;
 The sweating folk made straight their weary backs,
 And steeped in balm from bole and branches left
 Down homeward paths new-piled with fresh wood-stacks.
 Now lay the slope of glories all bereft
 Bare-bosom to the dews, while naked gold
 Faintly each murdered tree enaureoled.

And now earth bled through all her veins, for now
 Her wild wood-things might wander as they list,
 Unhoused, unsheltered on the shorn hill-brow;
 And many an oak had lost its melodist,
 And many a wing-worn minstrel sought the bough
 That God and April gave to him, and missed;
 Though death no longer smote the coppice-root,
 She felt his blows through all her pulses shoot.

It will be noted how fine and Elizabethan is Miss Sweetman's diction; and she has also a happy gift for narrative. Altogether, a remarkable volume.

The Ruba'iyat of Omar Khayyam Translated by Mrs.
 H. M. Cadell. (Lane. 5s. net.)

YET another version of Omar—this time by a lady, and vouched for by Dr. Garnett. It is, in truth, a very good translation. Mrs. Cadell is no FitzGerald; but her verse is always adequate and unpretentious, content closely to render the original. For those who wish to know Omar, not FitzGerald, this is as good a version as we have seen. Here is a specimen:

It gives me greater joy to speak to Thee
 Of that dark secret in the tavern gay
 Than without Thee in sombre mosque to pray.
 O Thou of all creation First and Last!
 Say wilt Thou burn me at the end of time
 Or be all goodness then to me and mine?

We must, however, comment on the final rhyme of "time" and "mine."

A Book about Tolstoy.

How Count Tolstoy Lives and Works. By P. A. Sergyeenko.
 Translated from the Russian by Isabel F. Hapgood.
 (J. Nisbet & Co. 5s.)

THIS is a queer but rather interesting little book. Mr. Sergyeenko, whose name is new to us, uses sometimes that direct and naked artlessness of simple narration which is so strangely effective in the hands of Slav writers. Thus, from the beginning of the volume:

COUNT TOLSTOY AND HIS WIFE.

About four o'clock in the afternoon, in the winter of 1892, I was sitting with my friends the A.'s, who had arrived in Moscow on the previous evening from their estate in the south. Several other guests besides myself were seated at the tea-table engaged in a lively conversation about one of Lyeff Tolstoy's latest works.

Out of doors a fine snow was falling, and in the room the twilight was gathering.

Just as the discussion had reached its height a gaunt old man, of medium stature and with the typical face of the Russian peasant, entered the room. He wore a short, sheepskin coat, and tall felt boots. As he entered he said, "Good afternoon," removed his felt cap, and began to unwind from his throat a woollen scarf.

From the table where we sat we could not see the door plainly, and the A.'s stared with curiosity and surprise at the newcomer.

Suddenly the hostess's face beamed with delight, and she said, in a drawing voice:

"Lyeff Nikolaevitch! how do you do?"

All rose to their feet.

It was Count L. N. Tolstoy. He untied his scarf, and, with a brisk, youthful movement, threw off his fur coat, casting sharp glances about as he did so in search of a place to lay it.

There is a picture of Russian life, complete and convincing. The scene and the man are presented to you, and you have already a more intimate vision of the Count than ever before. On the other hand, Mr. Sergyeenko is often capable of aggravating literary gaucheries:

L. N. Tolstoy has always regarded Turgenev as a leading man, well educated and very talented; but his productions in the realm of belles-lettres, with the exception of The Diary of a Sportsman, never evoked rapture in L. N., and, of course, he could not nourish himself on them.

Imagine it! Imagine Tolstoy speaking of Turgenev as though he were some smart journalist of Odessa, just beginning to make a stir in the town's life! Think of Turgenev being "well educated and very talented," and of his "productions in the realm of belles-lettres!" Yet the next passage, describing how the Count fell asleep over Fathers and Children, and woke up to behold Turgenev's gigantic figure retiring from the room in disgust, is admirable. As a whole, Mr. Sergyeenko's volume is unequal. It is by turns intensely graphic and intensely futile. What it chiefly lacks is a plan. The author appears to have written down anything that he saw, as he saw it, without distinction or selection, and without very much thought. We should say that he has not formed, even in his own mind, a clear, consistent image of the figure of Tolstoy. At any rate, the book leaves a confusing impression.

Some important matters, however, emerge clear, and one is the dual nature of Tolstoy, half artist and half man of action. Just as there are, unhappily for themselves, men with small imaginative puissance who are always tormented with a desire to create, so there are men of tremendous artistic fertility who are content, being busy with other affairs, to leave that fertility latent for long periods. Tolstoy is a striking example of the latter class. It seems incredible that a man so conscientious, and so richly gifted as an artist, should find his salvation in activities quite foreign to any art: should even condemn and despise art. But so it is. Possibly he has been led away from art not so much by the conviction of his own mission as a reformer, as by the realisation of the commanding influence of his own personality on others. Convinced of that influence, his sensitive conscience would doubtless cause him to be preoccupied concerning the right way of using it, and in this manner he might be gradually metamorphosed from artist into apostle. Such a theory is conceivable. The extraordinary vigour of Tolstoy's personality, at once impressive and attractive, is illustrated throughout the volume. He is a magnet for the legitimate and illegitimate curiosity of Europe. He can only be sure of solitude when his wife—who, by the way, permits herself to differ sharply from him on many things—stands guard at his study door. He must hold a reception every evening whether he will or not—such is the force of public opinion even in Russia—and all men, from the staff of the Daily Chronicle to the moujik in sheepskin, take their tea out of his samovar.

Lyeff Nikolaevitch had hardly made his appearance, when several persons quitted the poor people's tree and approached the porch.

"Good day. What's the matter?" inquired Lyeff Nikolaevitch quietly, but with a curt, businesslike tone, thrusting his staff under his arm, and unfolding a document which a peasant had handed to him.

The man began incoherently to explain some law case. Lyeff Nikolaevitch listened to him for a while, with concentrated attention, and kept repeating:

"Just so, just so."

Then, evidently having formed a clear idea of what the peasant wanted, he thrust the document into his pocket, and promised to do all that was necessary, that is, to write a complaint to the Court of Appeal.

Another peasant, of small stature, ill-favoured, with shifty eyes, held by the hand a pale, scrofulous little boy, and stared intently at him. Evidently, according to the programme already prepared, the boy was expected to move Lyeff Nikolaevitch to compassion in some way. But the boy had become confused, and hung back. Lyeff Nikolaevitch asked the peasant what he wanted. . . .

So this "bed of justice" continues. Then we set off through the park. But the ugly little peasant and his scrofulous boy intercepted our path. Lyeff Nikolaevitch halted.

"What do you want?"

The peasant thrust forward the boy. The boy hesitated, became agitated, and, drawing out his words, appealed to Lyeff Nikolaevitch:

"Gi-i-i-ve the co-o-o-olt—"

I felt uncomfortable, and knew not in which direction to look.

Lyeff Nikolaevitch shrugged his shoulders.

"What colt? What nonsense? I have no colt."

"Yes, you have," declared the ill-favoured little peasant, moving briskly forward.

"Well, I know nothing about it. Go, and God be with you!" said Lyeff Nikolaevitch, and, taking several strides, he leaped over a ditch.

Remember that this is a man approaching seventy. Mr. Sergyeenko deems it incomprehensible that Turgenev, who, it must not be forgotten, really saw very little of Tolstoy, could fear or suspect that the author of War and Peace might one day entirely abandon his art. We do not agree with Mr. Sergyeenko. Many men besides Turgenev have had the same fear about Tolstoy, and surely not quite without cause. But let us be reassured. The artist in Tolstoy is constantly coming to the surface in these pages. Here is a scene:

While returning home one night last year, in Moscow, with one of his friends, Lyeff Nikolaevitch suddenly came to a halt, and, inhaling the air with avidity, he exclaimed passionately:

"Heavens, how I want to write! My brain is seething with images."

"Then why this delay, Lyeff Nikolaevitch?" inquired his companion.

"Time is lacking. I have work for a hundred years, and I have but three days to live."

That is the veritable artist, speaking under the stress of creative impulse. It was a pity that he had to explain to the excellent but somewhat dull friend who received the outburst that he did not literally mean "three days."

There is much more in Mr. Sergyeenko's book that calls for quotation and comment, but we must make an end. The descriptions of Tolstoy's life in the midst of his large and strenuous family are piquant and charming. The vitality of this household is marvellous, and the spring of it all is the old Count himself. We see him as a great man, actuated by a sincerity which is now comic, now terrible, but always fine—a great man not entirely without some of the pretty (not petty) little foibles of greatness.

England's Patron Saints.

Studies in Church Dedications; or, England's Patron Saints.
By Frances Arnold-Forster. In 3 vols. (Skeffington & Son. 36s. net.)

ENGLISH villages are often commonplace, and sometimes ugly. Many of them are undignified by historic association, and cherish no legend. But most of them possess at once a cabinet of antiquities and a mellow glory in their parish churches. It is, however, a noticeable fact that, while the explorer of a church usually cultivates a lively curiosity in its monuments, stained glass, and architecture, he seldom bestows half a thought upon the subject of its dedication. That this is a matter of interest second only to the fabric and its adornments has occurred to comparatively few. And yet what hints of quaint, tender, and splendid suggestion are vouchsafed by such dedications as those of St. Dunstan, St. Mary of Charity, St. Michael and All Angels! What a homely relish of Saxon England in that of St. Guthlac in the Fenlands, what a quick memory of our "spacious times" in that of St. Elizabeth at Tilbury! And to come both nearer home and to range farther afield, with what "a continuity of good," as Archbishop Benson said, do Rahere's solemn church and great hospital of St. Bartholomew in Smithfield link us to that island in the Tiber where rose the noble tower of St. Bartholomew upon the site of a temple of Æsculapius.

A book that deals with "all the known dedication names found in England, about six hundred in all," which are distributed among fourteen thousand churches, and treats of some of them in considerable detail, is obviously an undertaking which might foolishly result in the confounding of confusion. But these three volumes are a well-arranged and efficient guide to the wayfarer upon the retired track that they follow. It is true that they are largely a compilation, but they are an excellent compilation upon a theme which easily admits of a bad one, and the mass of information that they present with great readiness and lucidity must be sought elsewhere at the cost of time, trouble, and many books. For here are to be found biographies in outline of troops of holy historical personages, and dim legends of the films and shadows of sanctity—numerous little disquisitions on the developments and changes of the dedications of particular churches—comparative estimates of the popularity of certain dedications at various times, with expositions of the causes of that popularity, together with a world of minor odds and ends of local and general antiquarian interest.

To take a prominent example. We learn of St. George, "whose name," to alter slightly the words of Pope Gelasius as quoted by the writer, "is justly revered among men, but whose actions are known only to God"—we learn of St. George, our patron saint, that out of our vast crowd of churches there are fewer than two hundred dedications in his honour. This paucity is a matter of some wonder. But the saintly patron who was superseded by this chivalric ideal is distinguished in this connexion to a still lesser degree, for it appears that not more than fourteen churches perpetuate the fame of St. Edward the Confessor, of which two only are later than the Reformation. It is instructive to note the ebb and flow in the number of dedications to St. George. The earliest remaining seems to be at Doncaster, and dates from 1061. But it is apparent that the martial days of Edward the Third were the shining age of our national saint. His name then rang upon many a bloody field—the Knights of the Garter were ranged under his triumphant banner—and the great chapel at Windsor was refounded and rededicated to the "Happy Warrior" whose sword lightened so balefully in the forefront of "England's War." In the days of the fiery fifth Henry St. George was raised to the pinnacle of his English ecclesiastical glory by Chicheley, Archbishop of Canterbury, who directed that his feast should be celebrated "with the same solemnities as Christmas Day." But when our British Solomon filled the judgment-seat, the Red Letters of St. George's Day disappeared from the Prayer-Book, and his name and fame began "to bate and dwindle." They were not revived until, in the irony of things, and in the absurdity of aural association, a wind of memory stirred the dead laurels of chivalry upon the advent of the procession of Georges from overseas.

Of the three other British national saints, St. Andrew, as might have been inferred from his position in the hierarchy of the Apostles, is best known among us. There are between six and seven hundred churches bearing his name. The genial and poetic St. Patrick has but nine, while St. David has some twenty-four, most of them being naturally upon that part of our soil that "marches nigh Wales."

But it would be an error to suppose that the interest of church dedications centres wholly in the personal histories or legends of their patrons, and in the appeals which these make to our hearts or imaginations. Not infrequently a careful study of a dedication will issue in the discovery of a scrap of minor history, and, as the author points out, this is more especially so in the case of ancient churches "lying within the sphere of Celtic influence," which, "as a general rule, we may assume were actually founded by the saints whose name they bear." Upon this assumption we may say that the footprints of a Celtic saint are often piously roofed over and indelibly preserved by the churches which he planted. But historical continuity is illustrated in other ways, and there are brand-new churches in London which should keep alive among the surrounding populations, were their dedications clearly understood, the memory of sacred edifices in the parent City, now demolished. Such, for instance, are St. Benet's, in Kentish Town, and St. Dionis, at Fulham, both deriving their foundation from the proceeds of the sale of churches so named which long stood under the shadows of St. Paul's.

To conclude with a typical example of curious change and verbal corruption in dedications. It is to be found in the case of St. Martha's-on-the-Hill, which commands miles and miles of Surrey heath and woodland near Guildford, and which must be a familiar landmark to many wandering Londoners. "Its original dedication to the Holy Martyrs" is believed to commemorate certain unknown local martyrs of very early date. The vagueness of this dedication was unsatisfactory to the priest-in-charge, and in the days when the chapel became a convenient halting-place for the pilgrims on their way to the shrine of St. Thomas at Canterbury, what more natural and easy than to adopt St. Thomas for an additional patron? The invocation then ran as follows—"St. Thomas of Canterbury and All Holy Martyrs"; but in course of time, when Becket's intercessions were no longer sought after, his name ceased to be associated in the Chapel on the Hill. "The Martyrs" lingered for a while, then they, too, were forgotten, and "The Martyrs" became gradually corrupted into the present meaningless "St. Martha."

Enough has been said to show the wide scope and general interest of these volumes as books of reference. As such they should be exceedingly useful, and the writer modestly disclaims for her labours any attempt to "offer anything new to professed scholars." Three valuable appendices are included: the first being a "Statistical Summary of Dedications"; the second an "Index of Parishes, Alphabetically Arranged, with the Dedications of their Several Churches"; and the last an "Index of Saints, Alphabetically Arranged, with the Several Parishes in which their Churches are Found."

"The Star."

Tales of Space and Time. By H. G. Wells. (Harpers. 6s.)

MR. WELLS'S new book is an assemblage of examples of his strange gifts. In one story, a man gazing into a crystal egg observes events that are passing in Mars: an idea of almost absurd grotesqueness when stated thus bluntly, but in the story itself touched with an eeriness and a persuasiveness that relegate scepticism to the back of one's mind. In another, we are whisked back to the Surrey of the Stone Age, where two young lovers hide amid the terrors of the jungle from the terrors of the tribe, and incidentally we are in at the birth of the first axe and observe it tasting its first blood. In its pendant we make an excursion into the far future of When the Sleeper Wakes, and find, done in smaller compass and with finer spirit, the more pertinent social predictions of that book, together with a description of much the same part of Surrey as that wherein our remote ancestors lurked and loved in the companion story, and a similar romance as the motive of the tale: the author's purpose being, we take it, to illustrate the permanence of human nature amid the flux of Time. The last story is a humorous fantasy in the manner of The Invisible Man, describing the embarrassments of a commonplace young fellow incident upon his discovery that he could work miracles. All of these tales are good: clearly and courageously thought out, fitted together expertly, straightforward and unhesitating; but, though technically perhaps brighter and more faultless than his earlier work, they mark no important advance in Mr. Wells's career.

We have, however, to speak at length of one contribution to this volume—a brief affair of but twenty pages, called "The Star," a masterpiece of dramatic progression. The idea, a very simple one, must have occurred to hundreds of people with any imagination—the sudden appearance within our system of a runaway star, bearing down on this little star which we call the earth. But to transfer the situation to paper; to describe rightly the appearance of the strange luminary; to record the progress of emotions from languid interest to apprehension and sickening foreboding as the menace grew nearer; in short, to make the thing as real as the nightmares which thrive on such dread possibilities—that is another matter. There are two ways of writing such a story as this: the artist might make it wholly terrible, or he might look farther and make it beautiful too. Mr. Wells has chosen the latter course. The mere experimentalist in gruesomeness would leave us shuddering. Mr. Wells keeps our mind also on the wonderfulness, the mystery, the appalling beauty of the invader. In fact, in "The Star"—after several excursions into more popular and profitable forms of writing—he rises again to the colder heights of poetical imagination on which he planned The Time Machine and wrote its concluding pages.

We quote a few passages:

The Winter's dawn it was, a sickly filtering accumulation of daylight, and the light of gas and candles shone yellow in the windows to show where people were astir. But the yawning policeman saw the thing, the busy crowds in the markets stopped agape, workmen going to their work betimes, milkmen, the drivers of news-carts, dissipation going home jaded and pale, homeless wanderers, sentinels on their beats, and in the country labourers trudging afield, poachers slinking home, all over the dusky quickening country it could be seen—and out at sea by seamen watching for the day—a great white star, come suddenly into the westward sky!

Brighter it was than any star in our skies; brighter than the evening star at its brightest. It still glowed out white and large, no mere twinkling spot of light, but a small, round, clear shining disc, an hour after the day had come. And where science has not reached men stared and feared, telling one another of the wars and pestilences that are foreshadowed by these fiery signs in the Heavens. Sturdy Boers, dusky Hottentots, Gold Coast negroes, Frenchmen, Spaniards, Portuguese, stood in the warmth of the sunrise watching the setting of this strange new star. . . . Round the world that day, two hours before the dawn, went the pallid great white star, fading only as it sank westward and the sun mounted above it. Everywhere men marvelled at it, but of all those who saw it none could have marvelled more than those sailors, habitual watchers of the stars, who far away at sea had heard nothing of its advent, and saw it now rise like a pigmy moon and climb zenithward, and hang overhead and sink westward with the passing of the night.

That is merely preparation. So far no one is disturbed. Interest is the feeling; the star must be glanced at as we glance at a comet or a shower of Leonids: they make good conversation. But that is only for a brief space. Something more serious than mere interest is in store:

And when next it rose over Europe everywhere were crowds of watchers on hilly slopes, on house-roofs, in open spaces, staring eastward for the rising of the great new star. It rose with a white glow in front of it, like the glare of a white fire, and those who had seen it come into existence the night before cried out at the sight of it. "It is larger," they cried. "It is brighter!" And, indeed, the moon a quarter full, and sinking in the west, was in its apparent size beyond comparison, but scarcely in all its breadth had it as much brightness now as the little circle of the strange new star.

"It is brighter!" cried the people clustering in the streets. But in the dim observatories the watchers held their breath and peered at one another. "It is nearer," they said. "Nearer!"

Uneasiness creeps abroad, insidiously, undeniably; and the strain upon the reader begins also to be unbearable. Not less so for this aside, wherein the difference between Mr. Wells and other toilers in the same field may be studied:

The light of that day went the way of its brethren, and with the later watches of the frosty darkness rose the strange star again. And it was now so bright that the waxing moon seemed but a pale yellow ghost of itself, hanging huge in the sunset. In a South African city a great man had married, and the streets were alight to welcome his return with his bride. "Even the skies have illuminated," said the flatterer. Under Capricorn, two negro lovers, daring the wild beasts and evil spirits, for love of one another, crouched together in a cane brake where the fire-flies hovered. "That is our star," they whispered, and felt strangely comforted by the sweet brilliance of its light.

One more passage and we leave "The Star" to the reader:

That night the star rose later, for its proper eastward motion had carried it some way across Leo towards Virgo, and its brightness was so great that the sky became a luminous blue as it rose, and every star was hidden in its turn, save only Jupiter near the zenith, Capella, Aldebaran, Sirius, and the pointers of the Bear. It was very white and beautiful. In many parts of the world that night a pallid halo encircled it about. It was perceptibly larger; in the clear refractive sky of the tropics it seemed as if it were nearly a quarter the size of the moon. The frost was still on the ground in England, but the world was as brightly lit as if it were midsummer moonlight. One could see to read quite ordinary print by that cold clear light, and in the cities the lamps burnt yellow and wan.

And everywhere the world was awake that night, and throughout Christendom a sombre murmur hung in the keen air over the country side like the belling of bees in the heather, and this murmurous tumult grew to a clangour in the cities. It was the tolling of the bells in a million belfry towers and steeples, summoning the people to sleep no more, to sin no more, but to gather in their churches and pray. And overhead, growing larger and brighter, as the earth rolled on its way and the night passed, rose the dazzling star.

We have quoted enough to show the quality of this little story. It is not quite perfect; here and there we detect declensions from the mountain path which the author has chosen; but it is a great achievement, and when we compare the space to which he has confined himself with the amplitude and terror of his conception we are amazed at the effects which he has been able to produce.

The Doctor.

Johnson Club Papers. By Various Hands. (Unwin. 6s.)

"To talk about Dr. Johnson has become a confirmed habit of the British race." Thus Mr. Birrell in his paper on "The Transmission of Dr. Johnson's Personality," which is the first of the sixteen tributes to Dr. Johnson's memory contained in this volume. It is quite true. By the Doctor's words you are still assailed, supported, placated, routed, touched, or amazed in this our England. It would be good to speculate on the quality of the national acquaintance with Dr. Johnson's words. How much is second-hand and traditionary? An enormous proportion, no doubt. And the Johnsonian, or—to rise to the height of Mr. Lionel Johnson's rhythmic enthusiasm—the Johnsonianissimus, will be perfectly content if you go about to prove that for every thousand Britons who bring Dr. Johnson into their talk only one sits down to read Boswell's Life. This is fame. Just as Shakespeare is quoted of cabmen and costermongers in moments of elevation, and is thereby glorified beyond all writers, so is Dr. Johnson honoured by that ignorance of his words and works which, dark though it be, cannot expel his name, and at least one of his replies, from the meanest memory. Precious as spikenard is the story which Mr. Birrell tells of an ignorance blander than this, which was yet so contrary to British fitness that at a touch it exploded, and became a white light of knowledge. It happened that at a dinner of the Johnson Club there was present Bonnor, the Australian cricketer. How he got there the gods know, but there he sat—among the Johnsonianissimi—in the big room at the Cheshire Cheese, in Fleet-street. And Bonnor confessed to the company that until that evening he had never heard of Dr. Samuel Johnson. Whereupon someone tittered. When you come to think of it, someone would titter. Bonnor, the bearded, the terrific, the clear-eyed, drew himself up to his full height of six-feet-six, and said: "Yes, and what is more, I come from a great country, where you might ride a horse sixty miles a day for three months, and never meet anybody who had. But I have heard of him now, and can only say that were I not Bonnor the cricketer I would be Samuel Johnson." Even the Johnsonianissimi, even the good fellows who did not titter, must have reeled under this dynamic eulogy.

JOHNSON IN HIS TRAVELLING DRESS.

And the truth is that Dr. Johnson is worthy of such worship. You may begin by picking out his faults, but you will end in venerating the noble proportions of this most human, imperfect, and right-minded man. How infallible is such love! How wisely we select the friend whose claims are obscured by nothing worse than time! How bracing and drastic is the affinity between the sane Englishman and Dr. Johnson!

Well, these Johnson Club people are just the advance guard, or, if you like, the interior phalanx, of this Johnson-loving nation. They meet at the Cheshire Cheese in Fleet-street four times a year, and gorge, and orate, and explore the mind of Dr. Johnson. They have a Prior, Prior Unwin; the same publishes these Papers. They have a Poet, Poet Lionel Johnson, who sings their emotions—

When the Scribe gives the word for beginning the revel,
 And everything dismal is sent to the devil:

When the Chaplain has murmured his brief Benedicite,
And we sit on "the thrones of all human felicity" (Which is how, you must know, "tavern chairs" were defined

By the Great Lexicographer's accurate mind):
When nobody bothers us, critic or creditor,
Client, constituent, contributor, editor;
When we've done for awhile with all worry and work,
Free and easy as any unspeakable Turk:
When for winter's worst weather we care not a jot,
But the fogs and the winds and the rains are forgot
In the pipe-bowl so ruddy, the punch-bowl so hot:
When the firelight goes dancing around the old wall,
And glows on our glasses and us, one and all,
And our feast is the bravest for miles round Saint Paul!

Why labour to review this book? The book is good. We shelve it, and advise you to do the same. This is what it contains. First, Mr. Birrell birrells on Dr. Johnson; Mr. Gennadius writes on Dr. Johnson as a Grecian; Dr. George Birkbeck Hill takes us trippingly through Boswell's proof-sheets of the Life (this is new and illuminating); Mr. A. W. Hutton tells how Johnson as a young man wriggled into the staff of the Gentleman's Magazine; Mr. H. W. Massingham gathers "Some Johnson Characteristics." And for the rest there are papers on Dr. Johnson's politics; a humorous defence of the Doctor against a vague charge that he cared for music, by Mr. J. Sargeant; and a bright paper on "Dr. Johnson as a Traveller," by Mr. George Whale. There are other papers. There are also pictures and facsimiles, two of which we reproduce. We are sorry to end on process blocks, but this is to convey information when the heart is full.

THE REALMS OF GOLD.

BY JOHN DENNIS.

THIS is "a book for youthful students of English literature," a literary Baedeker, as it were, for the lands beyond Darien. Mr. Dennis has a turn for edification, and, to be quite frank, he pulls us up several times in the first chapter, or "talk" as he prefers to call it, with the doubt whether he is not going the right way to repel precisely those readers whom he most desires to attract. He preaches the study of the classics, which is good; but he thinks it necessary to give point and antithesis to his sermon by a studied depreciation of certain modern writers whom he does not specify, but whom we fear the lad or lass into whose hands the book may fall will not be slow to identify with just those modern writers, whoever they may be, who are nearest to his or her own heart and imagination. And how shall the classics then be approached without prejudice? This is the kind of thing we mean. Mr. Dennis is dwelling on the prose of the English Bible:

It would seem impossible that any reader familiar with its dignity of style can fail to distinguish between majesty of thought and grandiloquence, between impassioned utterance and tawdry rhetoric, between the rhythmical flow of sentences which fall on the ear like music and the flowery and verbose style, by the help of which many a modern writer endeavours to conceal poverty of thought. And it would be possible, after listening to the enchanting music of Spenser or to the majestic utterances of Milton, the "God-gifted organ-voice of England," to prefer the thinner notes of versemen whose pretty knack of rhyming enables them to snatch a temporary fame.

Well, 1611 had not a monopoly of "dignity of style" and "majesty of thought": and 1899 has not a monopoly of "tawdry rhetoric" or "thin notes" or "flowery and verbose style." And our point is that the natural inlet of the budding mind to poetry is through the poets of its own day, and that the probable result of warning it off these will be to discourage it altogether, at the best of times no very difficult task. After all, the poets of each generation must be the nearest to that generation. They breathe its atmosphere, voice its ideals, whisper its doubts and hesitations. They have for it not merely the preserved fragrance of literature, but the heady perfume and savour of life itself.

To our thinking, then, Mr. Dennis, though full of good intentions, shows himself a bit of a pedant at the outset. After that he proves himself a sympathetic and well-informed conductor in a somewhat breathless voyage across the centuries, which starts from Chaucer and winds up with Tennyson. A few closing pages are devoted to Christina Rossetti and William Morris and Coventry Patmore. Browning is markedly excluded, and we are left to conjecture whether Morris and Patmore are let in because Mr. Dennis makes an exception for them to his general condemnation of the moderns, or because he happened to have written in a magazine an article about them which lent itself to adaptation. It will be seen that the book has a somewhat patchwork character, and this is increased by the fact that Tennyson and Scott are dealt with on a much larger scale than anybody else. Scott, indeed, has a "talk" to himself, and after reading it we are inclined to think that if Mr. Dennis had treated half-a-dozen other great writers in the same way, and had suppressed to make room for them his chapters of rapid summary, he would have provided a much better introduction to the "Realms of Gold" than, as a matter of fact, he has done. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.)

THE REVIVAL

OF ENGLISH AGRICULTURE.

BY P. ANDERSON GRAHAM.

This is an interesting, informing, and suggestive book. It is also refreshingly "up-to-date," being the record of inquiries made by the author, as Special Commissioner to the Morning Post, during the present year, into the recent development of English agriculture. Ten years ago Mr. Graham would not have spoken of a "revival" in farming. Indeed, he recalls in his introductory chapter the very different aspect which things wore when he was performing similar duties for two newspapers only ten years ago. At that time the landlord looked on his estate as if it were the burden carried by Christian; the farmer cursed the hour in which he had taken to tillage; the labourer was piling his belongings on a cart and sullenly making for town.

The blackest hour did but herald the dawn. Free Trade, which seemed to make an end of the British farmer, is gradually showing itself his best friend. And the British farmer is beginning to perceive it and to take heart.

If prices are against him other conditions are in his favour. Not only does population expand, but prosperity has brought with it a greater consuming power and a taste for a higher quality of goods. The sort of man who had bread and cheese for his dinner forty years ago now demands a chop; and he who was content with a chop can afford a chicken. All sorts of cheap and black bread are practically obsolete, and no man is so poor that he cannot afford a wheaten loaf. Take, for instance, such a luxury as strawberries. Within our own memory only the well-to-do ever dreamt of buying them, but now millions of pounds are consumed in the dwellings of the working-man. A certain fastidiousness is the natural consequence of all this. People will no longer be content with fat mutton, coarse beef, or ill-cured ham—they have arrived at a stage when they criticise the quality of their food. Yet all that is good for the English farmer. He has, at his very door, immense town populations that must not only have food, but food of a high quality. Other nations have appreciated the fact sooner than he did, and have been rather in front of him in supplying what was wanted. But he is learning that he also can do so, and do it better than anybody else.

The chief directions in which the revival has begun are those of market gardening, poultry keeping, and the dairy; nevertheless Mr. Graham is convinced that farming, as a whole, and not merely in new developments, is much better than it was seven years ago. It is with these improvements and the personal struggles they involve that Mr. Graham concerns himself. Essentially practical in its aims and contents, his book is yet poetically suggestive of green England and all manner of wholesome country toil. Milk, butter, eggs, poultry, cider, and bees, are all reviewed in turn. In almost every case Mr. Graham makes it clear that co-operation is the one thing needful to make small farming operations profitable. A very few hens, or a very few apple-trees, can be a source of income if only the small owner of the hens and apple-trees can sell his eggs and apples to a market agency on the spot. Co-operation, however, requires a good deal of unselfishness and breadth of view in those who attempt it, and in England it has been found that almost every co-operative agricultural scheme has depended on the energy, talent, and high-mindedness of one individual. Not yet, therefore, is co-operation easy to the English farmer. But its necessity is writ more plainly on his mind every year, and it is a singular thing that Ireland is in advance of England in this matter. The Irish Agricultural Organisation Society, headed by Mr. Horace Plunkett, has achieved wonderful things. But the necessary moral elements have there been enjoined and fostered by the Roman Catholic priests, who have given the organisation their effective support. In England the formation of co-operative centres in fruit-growing and dairying districts seems to depend on the wisdom and energy of landowners. It is much to be hoped that certain fine examples, duly mentioned and honoured by Mr. Graham, will be widely followed. The accent of this book is hope. (Jarrold & Sons. 3s. 6d.)

THE TRAGEDY OF HAMLET. EDITED BY EDWARD DOWDEN.

An edition of Shakespeare, by the author of Shakespeare, His Mind and Art, has long been desired. Here, for such as can afford to buy and shelve a volume to a play, is the beginning of an admirable one. The format of the book, weight, paper, print, size, and arrangement of page, are all just what they should be. The chief textual variants are at the foot of the page, and beneath these again such explanatory notes as the ordinary reader, who is not a specialist, will require. A good deal has already been written by way of explaining "Hamlet": but Prof. Dowden, "gleaning after the gleaners," has "perhaps brought together a slender sheaf." He somewhat naively details a list of his ears of corn in the Introduction, which is in other respects an excellent summary of the literary history of the play, fully up to the level of recent scholarship, both English and German. It is, of course, well known that the Second Quarto text of "Hamlet" is a good deal longer than the Folio, and it is generally said, as Prof. Dowden says, that "the Folio text was evidently cut for the purpose of stage representation." But why did it need cutting? Are we to give up the favourite modern theory which treats Shakespeare as before all things a "practical" playwright, and suppose that he wrote primarily for readers rather than for players, or that he had the literary but not the stage sense, and that his more "practical" fellow-managers of the Globe found it necessary to "arrange" his original text for the purposes of representation? Some such explanation Prof. Dowden suggests in the case of "Hamlet":

Shakespeare was attracted by the intellectual subtlety of "Hamlet," and was inevitably led by his genius to refine this subtlety, and to diversify its manifestations. He was caught in the web of its own imaginings, and became so absorbed in his work that he forgot to keep it within the limits suitable for theatrical representation; the tragedy has, perhaps, never been presented in its entirety on the English stage in consequence of its inordinate length.

An alternative theory suggests itself to us. Does the Quarto represent the play as performed at Court, where indeed the tradition was in favour of longueurs, and the Folio a "cut" version adapted to the truer dramatic instinct of the popular theatre? In any case, Prof. Dowden is not quite accurate when he says that "the tragedy has perhaps never been presented in its entirety on the English stage." The Quarto text was performed by Mr. Benson at Stratford last April, and will be performed by him at the Lyceum next March. He treats it like a Wagner opera: gives half of it before dinner, and half after. One may doubt the success of the experiment, for the intruding element of a meal must surely destroy the unity of spiritual mood so essential to the appreciation of the constructive unity of a work of art. There can be no doubt whatever about the design of the Elizabethan Stage Society, who propose to play this season not the Second Quarto, but the so-called First Quarto of the play. Now the First Quarto is not a text at all. It is a bungled piracy of an early version of the play, based probably upon hasty shorthand notes taken at the theatre, and vamped up into makeshift lines by some hack poet in the bookseller's pay. To act it seems to us to be antiquarianism run mad. (Methuen.)

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

BY THE RIGHT HON. SIR RICHARD TEMPLE.

Books about the inner life of the House of Commons are a regular product of the book-market, and this one has no very distinguishing features. Though written by a member of great experience, it contains only a few anecdotes, and is valuable chiefly for the accuracy of its general descriptions. Here is a description of the cheering:

The management of the cheering in the Chamber forms a sort of science—the parliamentary cheer consisting of the words "hear, hear"—no applause—that is, by clapping of hands—is allowed. The cheer from a single member is not infrequent, but is not significant unless it comes from some leading personage. It is the cheering in chorus, like one mind and one voice from a number of members, that forms the demonstration. This is often managed by a tacit consensus, but more often arises from an impulse stirring a body of men at the same moment from some words that have been uttered. The tone of the cheering then varies according to the temper of those who cheer, exactly according to their mood and sentiment at the moment. First there is the hearty, full-voiced cheer of genuine approval or satisfaction, hearty, resounding, full of encouragement, rising to the roof of the Chamber and awakening the echoes. There is next the low subdued cheer, gradually spreading along the green benches, indicating the deep-seated agreement which does not seek vociferous or hilarious expression; this is used either on solemn occasions, or at moments of pathos, or in acknowledgment of some concession or confession on the part of an opponent. Then there is the ironical cheering, which cannot be described but must be heard to be appreciated; the tone of sarcasm is always unmistakable; generally it is the cruel greeting given to an argument or a statement by an opponent, for the formal denying of which there may not be an opportunity. So far it is bitterly hostile; but sometimes good-humoured enough, when applied to an opponent who has unwittingly uttered something that damages his own case. As an intensification there is the sarcastic cheer, which is still sharper and more incisive; this again must be heard to be realised, it cannot be described.

In separate chapters Sir Richard Temple deals with "The House of Commons as a Club"; "The Precincts and the Buildings"; "Life in Parliament"; "Scenes in the House"; "The Irish Nationalist Party," &c. It is a book that would have been much improved by illustrations. (John Long.)

THE TRANSVAAL UNDER THE QUEEN.

BY LIEUT.-COL. N. NEWNHAM-DAVIS.

The author of Military Dialogues has written a pleasant book of reminiscences—his life as a freelance officer in the Transvaal twenty years ago. He gazed at Oom Paul's rusty silk hat at Pretoria, and shot at glass bottles in competition with Piet Joubert. A gossiping and well-illustrated record, forming excellent reading at the present moment. (Sands & Co.)

Fiction.

The Slave. By R. S. Hichens.
(Heinemann. 6s.)

LIKE other novels from the same hand, The Slave is a pure fantasy, invented, with a subtlety more intellectual than imaginative, upon the basis of a single idea. Mr. Hichens must always be incarnating the abstract, though after a very different manner from Wagner's. In the present instance his basic abstract idea is the passion for jewels—jewels, of course, standing for all the futile luxuries of this world. He turns that idea into a young and beautiful woman. Lady Caryll Allabruth lives for jewels. She will sell her soul and her body for them. If she has them, and nothing else in the world, she is happy. If she has everything else in the world, but not jewels, she is unhappy. Lady Caryll was fortunate in meeting so early in life an Anglicised foreigner of Oriental tastes, who instantly comprehended her with a perspicacity which Mr. Hichens does not in the least explain. Sir Reuben's own analysis of his wife is as ingenious as anything in the book:

"She was born to live in a harem, petted as an animal is petted, adorned with jewels as a sultan's favourite is adorned. Such a life would have satisfied her nature. Her soul shines like a jewel and is as hard. Human sorrow will never touch her, for she cares for nobody. Ordinary pride will never uplift her, for I believe that social position, that great traditions, are as dust in her eyes. But she must have a life that glitters with jewels or she would die or become as nothing. There are certain foods. Lady Rangedcliffe, that give certain powers to men. Well, my wife, to reach her highest and most complete development, must be fed upon a diet of precious stones—not quite in Cleopatra's way, though. You realise, or perhaps, being so splendidly human as you are, you don't realise, that a certain class of women has breathed through so long a chain of years a fetid atmosphere of unintellectual selfishness, has sold itself, body, mind and soul, so repeatedly for hard things that glitter, for gold, for diamonds, for the petted slave-girl's joys, that humanity has absolutely dwindled in the race, just as size might dwindle in a race breeding in and in with dwarfs. In Caryll that dwindling light of humanity—though the light of a strange intellect burns—has gone out. My wife's not human."

When Sir Reuben dies, ruined by Caryll's monomania, she contrives to keep in her poverty the one superb emerald by which he had won her. This emerald is stolen from her by a burglar. She could not recover it, the burglar being far too astute, and so she married the fellow, and the emerald once more burnt its green fires upon her breast. All which is according to the strange idiosyncrasy of Mr. Hichens—at once logical and splendidly absurd. The Slave is clever, we might almost say, to excess. It has the final brilliance which perfected skill can give. But we should call it cold, and though we have enjoyed it, we should deny that it in any way convinced us. The apt fertility disclosed in the working out of the theme might easily be mistaken for imagination. We think the quality ought rather to be termed invention, philosophic and calculating. There is a great deal in the book heartily to admire. The enormous and elaborately painted scenes of London society show fine and original observation. The description of Lady Ormyn's Sunday party at Epsom is a sustained piece of distinguished and relentless satire. The burglary of the emerald is a little masterpiece of psychic analysis. One side of the novel we have not touched upon—that relating to Aubrey Herrick, the young man-about-town who honestly loved Lady Caryll. Aubrey found spiritual consolation for his loss amid the more decent ornaments of the variety stage. The scenes of music-hall life are very well done, but strangely sentimental. The death of Alf Klick is a rich feast of pathos and tears. We doubt if Mr. Hichens was in reality serious over this matter. We deem him quite capable of accomplishing marvels of sentimentality in cold blood, sardonically, just in order to provide a piquant contrast to the main theme.

The Slave is neither a fine and serious novel, nor a novel for plain people. It is a literary bouchée (of 406 close-set pages) for those who have a taste occasionally for strange and exotic flavours. Judged as such, it is extraordinarily successful. Certainly it is the best book that Mr. Hichens has done. It has one obvious fault: Mr. Hichens, from what motive we cannot guess, has omitted the crucial scene in which Sir Reuben won Lady Caryll by means of his emerald.

Even If. By J. Morgan De Groot.
(William Blackwood & Sons. 6s.)

THE critics of Mr. De Groot's former book, A Lotus Flower, of which Even If is the sequel, had an embarrassing task set them, for the book was indeterminate, leaving behind it a vague distress, a sombre omen partly engulfed in difficult mysticism. Yet the book fascinated them, and now that the threads are unravelled of the lives of Hilda, Emile and Gerard, one almost feels that the wisest thing is to praise unreservedly a talent so bright and tender and electric. Yet the book—which, to begin with, is absurdly entitled—has faults; good thumping ones if it comes to that. The portrait of Count Sandeberg, a roué, is ludicrously out of drawing. He is an abominable cad (pp. 92 et seq.) and at the close a Bulwerian hero. The long arm of coincidence is twice thrust deeply into the plot; at least twice, too, the sentiment rings false, and so marked is the tragic atmosphere in the book that the cheerful dénouement comes almost with the shock of a barefaced lie. Let one critic, however, be philistine enough to confess his relief at that lie sanctified by the ratification of the author's hand and eye. For Hilda, the beautiful Swede, passionate without sensuality, impatient of the cold, hard, practical prose of life, found her way into that critic's heart. Women will find uncanny her aversion from the healthy and honourable gentleman who married her when they were both in love, and will hold that the freshness of her affections grows stale by transference.

But for us the culminating episode in Hilda's love-life has the charm of a pathetic naïveté. It is one of those impossible idylls that young men weave as though thereby to escape for a moment from those walls of convention which at once imprison and protect. Hear his diatribes against being lady-like; hear how he worries and wrangles with a phrase like comme il faut. And for an illustration of that deeper discontent which, in fact, is pessimism (for it attacks the universe), correct your idea of Mr. De Groot as a "popular novelist" with this passage:

It is a curious fact that we are all able to keep our sorrows to ourselves, but as soon as there comes a breeze of happiness blowing over our grey ocean of monotonous misery we ripple into chatter. . . . [And then, changing the metaphor appropriately for a mean and bitter one, the author adds:] We are incapable of self-restraint so soon as Fate throws us a meagre bone from that coveted flesh-pot, happiness. Do we altogether forget that we have a constant right to it as our natural and life-long food? . . . I can scarcely refrain from laughter, not at the thought that all we mortals are unhappy, but because we accept so gratefully the bare bone which is tossed to us, instead of throwing it back into the face of Fate with compliments, and a reminder that we are men—men, and not dogs.

Signors of the Night. By Max Pemberton.

ONE of the most fascinating figures in the history of Venice is the Servite monk Fra Paolo Sarpi. He was so great in science that Galileo called him "Padre and Maestro." He withstood Paul V. in his determination "to bring Venice into a state of respect and humiliation to Papal orders and decrees" and "carried the whole of Venice with him." His courage was dauntless and it was put to the proof by three attacks on his life. His piety was equal to his other gifts, and when he passed away, in 1623, "Venice lost one of the best and greatest of her sons." The reader who has only gone so far as to extract thus much information from Miss Wiel's history of Venice will turn with curiosity to Mr. Pemberton's volume Signors of the Night, where he will find the great Friar figuring as Fra Giovanni, and he will gather from the "foreword" that Mr. Pemberton "hoped to portray something of that conflict of ideas which permitted a priest to wield so great an influence in a Republic which by no means loved priests." Mr. Pemberton's attempt to realise this praiseworthy "hope" consists in presenting the Friar as a sort of Sherlock Holmes with the logicity left out—a ubiquitous personage with a manner of immense significance. "If men question you, as assuredly they will, bid them look upon the waters, where they shall find the answer of Venice and of Giovanni the monk." "What does Nina, the daughter of Barbarino, do alone in a church at midnight?" That is the style of the dialogue when it means to impress, and this solemn deliberateness and rhetorical ambiguity fit in well with the never-failing effectiveness of the "curtains." But why so sedate a "foreword," one may ask? For the stories are just short stories (Anglicé clever anecdotes) in which swift generalisation, such as "beautiful women glittering in jewels" and "Bianca, dressed as she had never dressed before," &c., take the place of creative descriptions with a reader hungry for dénouements. A pretty idea, that of the Friar's fatherly affection for a clown's daughter, runs through the book and strengthens the unity supplied by his recurrent personality. The volume is quite readable. The vigorous and well-reproduced illustrations by Mr. [?] P. Hard add to its attractiveness. But why, when Mr. Pemberton tells us that Nina's "rags, black and sombre, matched the shadows so well that even the lantern did not betray her," does Mr. Hard exhibit her (p. 113) in a faultless white frock?

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE LION AND THE UNICORN.

BY RICHARD HARDING DAVIS.

Eight short stories full of Mr. Davis's clear and radiant characterisation. The Lion and the Unicorn of the first story stand over a florist's shop in Jermyn-street and are the spectators of a delightful love drama through the middle window of the first floor. "The Man with One Talent" is a story of the Cuban war, and "The Editor's Story" is literary. (Heinemann. 6s.)

WHAT A WOMAN WILL DO.

BY LUCAS CLEEVE.

Will a good and pure woman allow herself to be divorced by her bankrupt husband, with the aid of a bogus correspondent, in order that he may marry an heiress and supply her with an income? The author says yes—for the sake of her children. Grant these premises, and you have a novel full of smart and bitter writing, readable and amusing in every page. (F. V. White & Co. 6s.)

THE JUDGMENT OF HELEN.

BY THOMAS COBB.

Helen's judgment led her to throw over Mr. Barbrook, the millionaire, in favour of Maurice Vaughan. The millionaire does not, however, lose a wife. The action takes place at a small seaside resort, and the whole story reads like a faithful account of actual conversations. In other words, the story is told by the characters rather than by the author. (John Lane. 6s.)

THE GOLDEN IDOL.

BY JOYCE EMERSON MUDDOCK.

Mr. Muddock once wandered in New Guinea, dodging death by sharks and miasma. This stirring tale of adventure is founded on his youthful experiences. The Golden Idol was a mythical treasure said to have been taken from Japan in the seventeenth century to New Guinea by pirates, who were wrecked and served up by the natives in stews and steaks. (Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d.)

AN UP-TO-DATE PARSON, AND OTHER STORIES.

BY HARRY LINDSAY.

Mr. Lindsay's Methodist Idylls, and More Methodist Idylls, were keen and humorous delineations of the phases of life with which they dealt. Here we are on the same ground. The new parson arrives for the first time at his chapel not, as was expected, in the circuit van but on his bicycle. Seth Chess could only gasp: "Be yo' th' praicher what be planned, or be yo' on'y a supply?" (Bowden. 3s. 6d.)

JUST JANNOCK.

BY EYRE HUSSEY.

Jannock is a North-country word, and means straightforward, honest, trustworthy, &c. Mr. Hussey's tale is a Thames riverside story, in which the jannockness of the various characters is tested and measured. The author is particularly satirical of young ladies who swagger about their really insignificant attainments in rowing, golf, &c. A pleasant, well-written story. (Macqueen. 6s.)

BY WEeping CROSS.

BY LADY LAURA RIDDING.

A short story, compact of love and religious persecution, laid around a Cistercian abbey in Southern France. Forests, vineyards, spacious seigneuries, and the abbey bells—these lend colour and sentiment. (Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d.)

ROSE AND CHRYSANTHEMUM.

BY CARLTON DAWE.

In this little story the author of A Bride of Japan once more deals picturesquely with the theme of love between an Englishman and a dainty Japanese girl. There are seven other stories of Japanese life, all vivid and readable. (Sands & Co. 6s.)

A VIRTUE OF NECESSITY.

BY HERBERT ADAMS.

A young doctor and the son of an earl are friends. The doctor's envy of his friend's blue blood is such that he exclaims: "Were I gifted with the charm and talents of an Admirable Crichton, the beauty and courage of the hero of a penny novelette, the fascination and manner of its villain," &c., "we should walk along separate planes, yours the superior, mine the inferior." Which the heir to the earldom correctly describes as "dismal drivel." The story of a doctor's wooing of an earl's daughter. (Greening. 6s.)

THE ENCHANTED TYPEWRITER.

BY JOHN KENDRICK BANGS.

The typewriter is manipulated by a spirit, the spirit of Jimmy Boswell, editor of the Stygian Gazette; and the owner of the typewriter soon becomes possessed of a great deal of gossip about Hades and its more illustrious inhabitants. This kind of thing must be done exceedingly well to be amusing, and we confess that the humour of Jimmy Boswell's communications escapes us. The book is printed from American plates; hence calibre is spelt caliber. (Harper Bros.)

THE BLACK TULIP.

BY S. J. ADAIR FITZGERALD.

"Write it," said the King. "I will," said Dumas. The King of the Netherlands had told the story of the Black Tulip to Dumas at Amsterdam. Dumas wrote the story, and a dramatisation of it is now being presented at the Haymarket Theatre. This new "Haymarket" translation is dedicated to Miss Winifred Emery. (Greening. 6s.)

The Dumas "Discoveries."

A Mistake.

DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI possessed a complete set of "Les Œuvres Complètes d'Alexandre Dumas, Publiées dans la Collection Michel Lévy"—those green paper-covered books at a franc which comprise 297 volumes. Who now among us has them all on his shelves? Although few of us have read through this Lévy garnering, incomplete as it is, those who care for Dumas have been eagerly looking forward to the publication of "two genuine romances by Dumas père, the very existence of which was never surmised by his relatives, publishers, or literary heirs." It was in these terms that the Outlook heralded the coming of The Snow on Shah-Dagh and Ammalat Bey, translated by Mr. Home Gordon.*

The discovery seemed to be a most remarkable one; and when we read Mr. Home Gordon's judiciously composed articles in the Outlook and Sketch, with which from time to time he was good enough to whet our appetites, and when, moreover, we saw with our own eyes samples of Dumas' beautiful little script in facsimile published by those journals, we rejoiced exceedingly. Certainly, the Outlook was amply justified in saying that widespread interest had been aroused. Shortly told, Mr. Home Gordon's story amounted to this: that M. Stylianos Apostolides, "a wealthy Greek gentleman extremely well read," having come into possession of the MS., had presented it to a public library in Cyprus; but, it occurring to him that he would do better to publish it, he withdrew it and took it with him to Paris. There he called on M. Calmann-Lévy, who, in his presence, declared the MS. to be "an absolutely authentic and entirely genuine work of the elder Dumas." M. Apostolides was also fortunate in obtaining from Dumas' legal heir a declaration of his perfect satisfaction that it was "an unpublished and hitherto unknown work by his illustrious ancestor." M. Apostolides then came to London and placed the document in Mr. Home Gordon's hands for translation. A careful examination showed that the MS. consisted of two complete romances, "not a single page being missing," as Mr. Gordon triumphantly declared in the Outlook.

Picture, if you can, the feelings of an Englishman who, having read of the publication in France of a totally unknown work by Thackeray, purchases it to find the great discovery to be, say, Lovel the Widower or Catherine. What words in compliment of the discoverer, the translator, and the publisher would he be likely to select in the first moments of his astonishment, and in what terms would our literary press notice the appearance of the book! The simple statement which we have to make concerning the true history of the stories which Mr. Home Gordon has taken the pains to translate sounds so incredible and, we fear, so unkind, that we almost hesitate to say that both stories are contained in the Lévy collection of Dumas' works. The Snow on Shah-Dagh is there called La Boule de Neige. Ammalat Bey is there called Sultanetta. Both are well known, therefore, all over the civilised world.

* The Snow on Shah-Dagh and Ammalat Bey. Posthumous Romances by Alexandre Dumas père. Translated by Home Gordon. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)

It is true that we believe neither story to be by Dumas. The first is in all probability by Pushkine,* and the second by Marlynsky. Mr. Home Gordon is aware of the latter fact, for he translated Dumas' preface, in which Marlynsky is credited with the authorship of the story. Rather curiously Mr. Gordon gave no hint of the matter in the Outlook, nor does he do so in his "Translator's Preface" to the book. That The Snow on Shah-Dagh was translated by Dumas is clear from a footnote by him. We are sorry that we must proceed to disillusionise Mr. Gordon further. He says, as we have seen, that his, or rather M. Apostolides' MS., is complete. But such is not the case. Mr. Home Gordon's MS. lacks the final leaf, and we are happy to be able to tell his readers that Mollah Nour, so far from being drowned in the Caspian Sea—where Mr. Gordon leaves him while his pursuers shout: "He is lost! Drowned! Dead!"—was saved. Here are Dumas' final sentences, following immediately on that exclamation:

Un formidable éclat de rire répondit à ces cris, et un hurra poussé par une douzaine de voix, sur une petite île qui s'élève à une quart de verste de Derb-nd, annonça aux poursuivants désappointés que non seulement Moullah Nour était sauvé, mais même qu'il se retrouvait au milieu de ses compagnons.

Les portes sont bien fermées dans la maison d'Iskander. Tout est bien tranquille dans sa chambre; à peine y entend-on un faible chuchotement.

La gaieté cherche le bruit: le bonheur aime le silence et la solitude!

This is highly satisfying. The Mollah Nour is too great a creation to be idly drowned.

Mr. Home Gordon does not say in his Preface whether the MS. gives titles to the stories. It may interest him to learn that The Snow on Shah-Dagh, which forms two volumes of the "Collection Hetzel," is there called Moullah-Nour (Bruxelles; Meline Cans et Compagnie). A copy of this pretty little book is before us. Rolandi's catalogue actually contains Ammalat Bey, by Alexandre Dumas. We have not yet had an opportunity of looking at the book—no doubt another Brussels publication. It remains for someone able to read Russian to turn to Pushkine's and Marlynsky's works, and, having found our two stories to be among them, to compare them with Dumas' versions and then write to the ACADEMY. Some admirers of Dumas would expect to hear that he has freely powdered the prose of those writers with gold dust, just as he scattered gems over the stories which his clever young apprentices prepared for his master-hand.

And we should not be surprised to learn, say, from Mr. Dent, that Mr. Gordon cannot even lay claim to be the first translator into English of both of the two tales. We sincerely hope, however, for his sake, it will prove that one at least of them has not before appeared in this country. In any event, Mr. Gordon has, it seems to us, done his work as translator well, and The Snow on Shah-Dagh in particular is worthy of Dumas or Scheherazade.

"OH! if I were only you!" I would say to him [Heine]. "You hold a lever in your hand with which you could bodily raise this little world, and you don't know how to use it!" Heine would listen, flattered and irritated at the same time by my words; for there is no doubt that he would have liked to play a part of this kind. But he knew as well as I did that he had neither the necessary energy nor force of character. Scoffers are not made to be leaders of the people, nor to point out the way to others. They cannot even start a revolution. Faith alone can remove mountains.

Translated by Mrs. Abel Ram.

Criticism by Semaphore.

A LITTLE book, in a red paper cover, hailing from the Midland Railway Institute at Derby, and entitled Handbook to Fiction, beggars all our experience of eager culture. For it appears that in Derby he who runs to the library may not only read, but, while running at top speed, may be taught what to read. He has only to pull from his pocket this Handbook to Fiction to find a flashlight criticism on any novel which he "fancies."

With abbreviations more ignoble than any which we ever adventured in a telegram, the Derby critic hits off novel after novel. The effect is appalling, and we are glad to surmise that this method of criticism is merely a concession to railway-readers accustomed to the jerky action of the semaphore. Not otherwise can we pardon such grotesque abbreviations as Sir Wa. Scott, Thdr. Watts-Dunton, G. Alf. Henty, Arth. Conan Doyle, Tob. G. Smollett, Ant. Trollope, Maur. Hewlett, Hub. Crackanthorpe, Ara. Kenealy, Ctte. Ma. Yonge, Ja. Matt. Barrie, and Gilb. Parker.

But, as we have hinted, abbreviation and forty miles an hour are the note of the book, and what seems crude and almost indecent mangling of critical speech in London may pass for expert literary signalling in Derby. Thus, suppose Mr. T. H. Hall Caine's Shadow of a Crime has taken the eye of a Derby fitter. Well, it is signalled to him as:

An imaginative romance of self-renunciation on a great scale, pivoting on a false suspicion of murder; noble and inspiring as a study of char., and essentially true to human nature. The Lake mountains are an effective theatre for the play of passion, and the people and manners are treated w. hist. accuracy.

Or he may recollect that he has never read Sir Wa. Scott's Rob Roy. It is signalled as:

A picturesque romance, containing several of Scott's raciest chars., and dealing incidentally w. the Jacobite agitation in Northumberland and the Highlands, a description that will probably decide him to read the book, if his eye does not fall on the far more alluring description of Rob. L. Stevenson's Catriona:

No more fascinating narrative was ever wr.; the dramatic suspense is absorbing, the char.-painting good, and the wild highland scenery realized in masterly fashion.

Char.-painting suggests a branch of spring-cleaning. Tob. G. Smollett's novel Humphrey Clinker is said to contain several of his "most irresistible chars." But these phrases have doubtless lost their terror in Derby, where Ctte. Brontë's Villette is understood to be "semi-biôg," where John Oliver Hobbes's The Gods, Some Mortals, and Lord Wickenham is allowed to be "a thoughtful bk. gracefully wr.," and where Trilby maintains its place as a "very pop. novel." But, for ourselves, give us chars.! We must read H. James's Bostonians again for its "calm portraiture wh. represents the chars. w. silhouette-clearness." Fes. Burney's Evelina, too; can we wonder that new editions still arrive? We know now that this novel is loved in Derby as the "hist." of a young lady's entrance into the world, abounding in "original char. sketches." A more tragic "hist. of a maid deceived" is Adam Bede, and it contains three of this auth's. choicest chars. But let Derby's voice be heard alone. G. Meredith's Ordeal of Richard Feverel:

The ordeal arises from the collision betw. the philosopher-father's system and the son's first love. No lit. can show a finer love-story; and the lyrical passion, the tragical intensity of certain scenes, and the supreme beauty of the style, make this prob. his greatest work.

T. Hardy's Far from the Madding Crowd:

Tragi-comedy of the pastoral life; crowded w. diverse chars. and "humours"; the title is ironical, and the views of char. and conduct are saddening to a thoughtful reader.

Thdr. Watts-Dunton's Aylwin:

The simple plot of a lover's quest for his beloved is ennobled by the distinction of the chars. (Rossetti and other celebrities are portrayed). The pure style and eloquent sayings, the pervasive glamour that makes the common-place beautiful, and the delectable humour tempering scenes of acutest pathos, are rarely found so closely wedded. The gypsy passages are worthy of "Lavengro": Sinfi overtops even the heroine.

Har. Frederic's The Market-Place:

The career of a daring, unscrupulous financier who by a deal wins a colossal fortune chiefly at the expense of the rogues. His char. is a bold and interesting conception, and the study of the methods and morals of the financial world is exhaustive and clear-sighted; but to paint vice so brilliantly is hazardous.

Sa. Grand's Heavenly Twins:

Deals cleverly and seriously, but at too great length, w. the marriage question, chiefly by advocating greater freedom for women. The bk. is inchoate, but full of various interest; the chars. are eccentrically humorous. Read, at least, Bk. IV.—The tenor and the boy.

Ant. Hope's God in the Car:

Deals w. smart, "up-to-date" society. The leading char. "Juggernaut," a man of immense will, promotes a company to take over vast estates in S. Africa. Plenty of sparkling, epigrammatic dialogue; the love int. well worked out.

The critic might have added that this is not Juggernaut's first appearance as a leading char.

Fs. Prevost's False Dawn:

The inherent chastity and strength of the prin. chars., an ambitious politician and the woman he loves, who is another's wife, make this a serious and wholesome bk. In psychol. method it resembles some French wks. The dialogue ambitious, but not quite a success.

Jer. Klapka Jerome's Three Men in a Boat:

Comic hist. of a picnic up the Thames. The fun is rather watery.

Rudyard Kipling's Jungle Book:

Two series of fables of man and beast in India by a 19th cent. Æsop, full of humour and wisdom, and of a charming tenderness for every living creature. The dramatic faculty which makes even the animals talk naturally is almost unique.

G. Washington Cable's Bonaventure:

The development of a saintly char. out of a nature originally selfish is worked out w. rare delicacy and tenderness as a phase of ethical history. The love-story is a perfect idyll; the char.-sketches of the primitive Acadians are humorous and lifelike.

Mrs. Marg. Oliphant's Miss Marjoribanks:

A delicate and sympathetic piece of anal. and char.-drawing.

It is neither fair nor wise to tell the raw novel reader what he ought to think of a novel before he opens it. To whisper to a library borrower that a novel is "depressing to thoughtful readers" is to take steps to make each new reader of that novel an empty prig. To waylay the reader of Mr. Howells's A Modern Instance with the warning that "flaws have been found in it, chiefly as regards his moral attitude towards the husband in his aberrations," is merely to quench the smoking flax of thought. No. The semaphore is an excellent instrument for guiding trains, but we hope that the general reader will refuse its guidance when he goes to the Free Library—where, of all places, choice should be free.

The Amateur Critic.

Tod Lapraik and Prince Otto.

A RE-READING of Wandering Willie's Tale, induced by Mr. Cornford's mention of it in his book on Robert Louis Stevenson in connexion with Tam Dale's Warlock story in Catriona, brought to my notice for the first time an interesting circumstance which may have escaped the attention of some readers. Tod Lapraik is the name of the chief person in Tam Dale's story; and, curiously enough, the name of the neighbour from whom Steenie, Willie's "gudesire," borrowed most of the money to pay his rent is Laurie Lapraik, who is described as "a sly tod." Of course this can hardly be mere coincidence. Stevenson must have known the Tale very well, and no doubt had the name and epithet in his mind, consciously or unconsciously, when he came to name his Warlock.

Perhaps you will let me enter at once a mild protest against Mr. Cope Cornford's treatment of Prince Otto. "We turn the last page with a feeling not far from disappointment," he says. It appears that "we had been led to expect so much, you see." Surely a second reading with chastened expectations would set this right. Indeed, Mr. Cornford, on a later page, recommends us to read the book twice, "once for the story, and again [and presumably finally] for the landscape." A third reading might be a good idea. The diligent reader might then perhaps succeed in the "endeavour to combine the two," that is, story and landscape; although it is apparently to be expected as the result of such an endeavour that he will "spoil the effect of both." Really all this seems rather absurd to those who have lost count of the number of times they have read the book, and who hope to read it many times more. Plainly, Mr. Cornford does not care much for Prince Otto. If it be the Cruz Stevensoniana, as some hold, no true Stevensonian is he. C.

Paul Déroulède.

It is twenty-one years since An Inland Voyage was given to the public. The little book has come of age. A day or two ago I was looking through it and lit on the name of Paul Déroulède, lately sentenced to three months' imprisonment. R. L. S., at Origny Sainte-Benoîte, comments on the hawker's collection of patriotic songs:

There was a number in the hawker's collection called Conscrits Français, which may rank among the most dissuasive war-lyrics on record. It would not be possible to fight at all in such a spirit. The bravest conscript would turn pale if such a ditty were struck up beside him on the morning of battle; and whole regiments would pile their arms to its tune.

Stevenson believes the mood will pass, and that "a sound-hearted and courageous people" will weary at length of "snivelling over their disasters."

Already [he goes on] Paul Déroulède has written some manly military verses. There is not much of the trumpet note in them, perhaps, to stir a man's heart in his bosom; they lack the lyrical elation, and move slowly; but they are written in a grave, honourable, stoical spirit, which should carry soldiers far in a good cause.

He concludes: "One feels as if one would like to trust Déroulède with something." S. B. T.

The Good Executor.

THE publication of R. L. Stevenson's letters has once more revived that hackneyed question of how soon after a writer's death should his letters be made public. As regards Stevenson the answer is tolerably easy, for he himself enjoined Mr. Colvir to edit a selection of his correspondence, a responsibility which, with fitting zeal, he was quick to discharge. The literary executor who best realises his duties acts without delay; one can better approve the prompt deed of John Wilkes in destroying Churchill's papers than that of a person of less decision. An author's death is now followed by the inevitable publication of his letters. It is too late to protest against a course which has been regularly practised for over a century. When letters are full of personal allusions—such as Horace Walpole's—a judicious selection should first be put forth, which might be supplemented at a later date with such letters that were withheld out of consideration to living persons. Talfourd followed this practice with regard to Charles Lamb's correspondence, in giving his first selection in 1837, five years after Lamb's death, and his Final Memorials some twelve years later. But not every editor can afford to wait seventeen years before discharging his obligations, and early publication with a good editor is better than late publication with a bad editor or no editor at all. R. I.

A Georgian New Testament.

THE production of the Twentieth Century New Testament reminds me that last century an attempt was made by Dr. Harwood, a Bristol divine, "to diffuse over the sacred page the elegance of modern English." I have never been fortunate enough to see a copy of what Dr. Harwood styled his "Liberal Translation," but in the memorial volume containing the autobiography and selections from the writings and addresses of the late Hugh Stowell Brown, of Liverpool, edited by Mr. W. S. Caine, there is an extract from Mr. Brown's Commonplace Book, in which he gives some curious quotations from this revised Testament. Everyone can appreciate the beauty of the lines beginning "Consider the lilies"; but can the same be said of Dr. Harwood's translation: "Survey with attention the lilies of the field, and learn from them how preposterous it is for beings who are endowed with natural natures to cherish a solicitous passion for dress"? John the Baptist's words: "Behold the Lamb of God," &c., are rendered: "Behold, yonder is the amiable object of the Divine love, who is appointed to reform the world." How truly Georgian, too, is Dr. Harwood's description of the prodigal's father as "a gentleman of a splendid family and opulent fortune"; or of the daughter of Herodias as a "young lady who danced with inimitable grace and elegance." Perhaps most typical of all is the alteration of Christ's question: "Whom say the people that I am?" into "He asked the disciples what opinion the vulgar entertained of Him." F. GLOVER ANDERSON.

Elia with Illustrations.

A Dainty edition of Lamb's Essays, illustrated by Mr. C. E. Brock, is now in the bookshops. To the true Elia the book will be something of a shock. It is too much to expect us to accept any version of the face of Mrs. Battle other than the one our imagination has contrived. And to have Lamb's text searched for pretexts for pictures is disconcerting. "He casually looketh in about dinner-time," says Lamb of the Poor Relation, and straightway the artist gives us a wrought picture of the intrusion. Again, in the "Detached Thoughts on Books and Reading," a full-page drawing is tacked to Lamb's quite incidental remark on newspaper reading: "In barbers' shops and public-houses a fellow will get up, and spell out a paragraph, which he communicates as some discovery." Obviously this is not sufficiently organic to the essay to call for illustration, and the drawing becomes, like the poor relation, "an impertinent correspondency." I must add that Mr. Brock's illustrations are most clever and sympathetic. But Elia and illustrations is rather like Elia and water. S. S.

Memoirs of the Moment.

"I AM willing to—outlive you." That was Browning's expression of the final sacrifice he was willing to endure for his wife; and it comes to the mind in the case of Lord Salisbury, who must have felt himself in that last pang at any rate the associate of Lord Beaconsfield. Fate was kinder in this to Mr. Gladstone than to his two opponents; but the three men had at least the common fortune of a long and affectionate partnership with women whose temperaments were exactly suited to their own. It is a pity when men who undertake to manage the affairs of the public fail in the conduct of their own. That large irony of life was spared to these three politicians, who owed in each case an astonishing portion of their perseverance in public life to the initiative and partizanship of their wives. Lord Beaconsfield and Mr. Gladstone married women of fortune, and there was real and material meaning in the public witness borne to Lady Beaconsfield by her husband comparatively late in life: "I do think I owe to that lady all that I possess." It was more in accordance with the temper of Lord Salisbury that he should marry a woman who brought him little, and whom he even made sacrifices to win. He braved his father's displeasure and the cutting down of his allowance. But to his own income—calculated cunningly to suffice for a bachelor younger son—his wife did, as a matter of fact, add a little dot she received from her father, who died just six months before she became a bride.

LADY SALISBURY had a deep admiration for her father, a man of quite singular piety and good sense. Among the little souvenirs he left behind him were some which she would not have exchanged for all the great possessions that came to her when her husband inherited the Salisbury title and estates, and when his great position brought every advantage within her reach. There was a memento of royal favour, earned on her own family's account, a little gilt drum and fife, which the Queen of William IV. gave to Baron Alderson at dessert when he dined with her and the King at Brighton, and which he promised to give to his children as a relic, whereupon the Queen sent them a packet of bon-bons, which the children, after wondering whether they, too, should be preserved as memorials of her Majesty's favour, finally fell upon and ate—a doubt and a dénouement that will be reproduced this Christmas in South Africa in the case of her present Majesty's "chocolate soldiers."

ANOTHER relic of her father, with which Lady Salisbury would not have parted for a king's ransom, was the little Prayer-book in which, on his daughter's birthday, before her confirmation, he wrote lines that bear copying out three-quarters of a century later, on the day of death:

Dear child, ere yet that covenant is renewed,
Which those who loved thee dearly made for thee,
When thou wast grafted in the Heavenly tree
Of Christ Himself—then first with life endued—
Thy father brings to thee a precious gift—
This little book with holy counsels fraught,
With humble prayers, by saints and martyrs taught,
And hymns sublime, that can the soul uplift
Heavenward from earth. O in this sceptic age,
If aught of doubt perplex thy simple mind,
Here turn for refuge. Here thy soul shall find
A safe, sure home. So, midst the flood's wild rage
The wandering dove, with flagging wings distressed,
Perched on the ark at last, and found her rest.

The reader, who does not look for poetry in a judge's lines, will perceive, however, that Baron Alderson was a High Churchman at that date, when High Churchmen were few and only feeling their way. The inference is, and it will not be an inaccurate one, that Lord Salisbury was taught and confirmed in the Higher Anglicanism by his wife, not she by him.

A LONG illness preceded the death of Lady Margaret Howard. It was a rather mysterious illness too, consisting in part of a lethargy, mild and flitting moods of which had visited her during her otherwise active and useful life. A great deal is unnecessarily written about the devotion to the poor of this or that person, who has done no more or less than is barely decent under the circumstances. But the words have a real significance in the case of Lady Margaret Howard. She took care of the charities of her life, and left the pleasures to take care of themselves—not a bad programme in the midst of a society bored by its pursuit of the amusing, yet one that brought her the perpetual condolences of acquaintances. She herself at moments—at sad moments—was almost persuaded of the hardship of her lot, with the ultimate result that she submerged herself more entirely than before in her charitable work. For two years she went into residence in the East End; and that involves no light sacrifice. For, if she did not find much profit in the ordinary "caller" in Wilton-place, she was keenly alert to intercourse with men and women of talent. Nine dinner parties out of ten might be tiresome; but at the tenth she met someone whose talk was her delight. "Get me something to eat," she would say when she got home; "I ate nothing at dinner for fear I should miss a word."

Now that the correspondence has reached home about the battle of Elands Laagte, something remains to be said about the death of Colonel Chisholme. He had ridden hither and thither before the fight, and seemed to have grown indifferent to the bullets that fell about him and did not hit him. One shell fell between his horse's feet and did not explode. The inference that you bear a charmed life comes easily and flatteringly at such a time, and Colonel Chisholme had the pleasure of danger in his blood when at last he rode forth at the head of his Light Horse, and this time rode forth to death. His last words were of that inconsequence which becomes haunting. "Mind you stick in my whistle," he said to Mr. Melton Prior, as that artist made a sketch of him on the field just before the final and fatal charge.

SOMEBODY said that "good wine needs no bush" when Bismarck's Biography, by Dr. Moritz Busch, was the book of its hour in 1880. But Busch certainly needed his Bismarck from first to last; and, now that he has just died at Leipzig, one scarce remembers his very good journalism, or his book on America, or his work in the Foreign Office at Berlin, but thinks of him only as the Boswell of the Man of Blood and Iron. The book of revelations that he printed after his master's death was sufficiently sensational to be much more than a nine days' wonder; and his name cannot even now be mentioned in certain circles without calling forth disdainful gestures from the otherwise dignified and impassive dwellers within the shadow of thrones.

DR. THOMAS MACKNIGHT, who spent thirty of the seventy years of his life in the editor's chair of the Northern Whig, was a journalist of the old school. Not only journalistic methods had changed in his time; but the very face of politics had altered its complexion and expression, so that he looked out at it with a pathetic lack of recognition. Like Sir William Harcourt later, he, in earlier life, had set forth like a young Goliath to slaughter Disraeli. He slung ink at the sphinx, with this only result, that the sphinx said his book was rather dull. The lapse of years has sufficed to give it a new interest now, when the old Whigs are all Tories and have taken into their temple the sphinx as chief idol.

Studies in Contemporary Style.

IV.—Idioms: Sound and Unsound.

IN your issue of November 11, "T. A. B.," who is courteous, opposed my objection to the phrase "his brother President," on the principle that one must not challenge an idiom. On reading his letter I realised that, if I could find a contemporary article carelessly sprinkled with idioms, "T. A. B.'s" principle could be proved uncritical. An idiom is an idiom, no doubt; it is a phrase in common use; but, whilst an apple is an apple always, one apple is rotten and another sound. Similarly, certain idioms are good and others bad. Common usage in the matter of phrases is not a proof that idiom is good invariably.

The contemporary writing which I was seeking I found in the Times of Tuesday. The writing, which was the leading article, began thus:

For the moment the movements of our transports continue to be the most important feature of which we have news in the military situation.

Now, movements cannot be called a feature. The characteristic quality of any feature is its permanence. Movement and permanence are contradictions in terms, in fact, and in thought. Thus, it is obvious that the writer in the Times is slack in his method of expression. He is a person of the sort who, not knowing that phase can properly be applied to the moon only, would speak of the phases of a subject, instead of speaking about the aspects. The words feature and phase are often used by illiterate writers and speakers. As most writers and speakers are illiterate, both words are put frequently to base uses.

The writer in the Times goes on:

The fact should convince the Government, as it has convinced the country, that only the best and swiftest ships should be chartered where the lives of our soldiers and the success of our arms are at stake.

Why where? In the thought which he is endeavouring to express, the writer is not dealing with a matter of place. He is dealing with a matter of time. Instead of where he should have written when. This confusion of the adverbs of place and those of time so much annoyed Mr. Delane, a famous editor of the Times, that in his day a law in the office of the great journal was, I am told, that any writer who used the phrase takes place, or took place, should be dismissed. That was a sound law. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, at the least, the person who writes, or says, "takes place" is not meaning to draw attention to the place of a happening. He is meaning to draw attention to the time. Therefore he must be reprimanded. I say this despite the knowledge that takes place is an idiom in France. Although certain persons in France are reputed to excel in art, I cannot allow that France is superior to England in the matter of expressing thoughts.

Thus saith the writer in the Times:

In a few days more Sir Redvers Buller will have at his disposal a force sufficient to enable him to assume the offensive in Natal.

Note the word assume. It is idiomatic. It is soundly so. When Shakespeare says

Assume a virtue if you have it not he is not inciting to hypocrisy. He is expressing an imperative wish that a certain virtue should be acquired. Thus, although there is a slight difference between the use of the word assume by the poet and that by the writer in the Times, the journal is justifiable in this case. The poet applies the word to a moral state, and the prosaist applies it to a tactical stage; but the word fits into both cases.

Judging from this concession as to the flexibility of certain idioms, "T. A. B." will perceive that these brief essays about style are not those of a grammarian clad immovably in iron. Still, there are some considerations concerning which the grammarian must needs, by stress of thinking, be iron-clad. There are usages in expression, idioms, that are slack and bad. Here, from the article in the Times that we have been examining, is one of them:

Father Matthews has given our Correspondent an explanation of the disaster which renders that event rather less intelligible than it was before.

The sentence might have stopped at intelligible. All that is implied by than it was before was affirmed. The writer may have felt that if he had stopped at intelligible he would have left the sentence abrupt; but that feeling would have arisen from an imperfect sense of euphony. Certainly there is no reason why he should not have struck out before, the meaning of which is implied in the tense of the verb immediately preceding. The word is a concession to idiom in the consciousness of a writer who, not content with being clear, is resolved upon being euphonic also. Euphony is often the thief of time and space.

Correspondence.

"The Knowledge that Was."

SIR,—Just before reading "Y.'s" article on "The Knowledge that Was," in the ACADEMY of November 11, I had been drafting, and re-drafting a preface to a little historical text-book I have been perpetrating. (It's my fourteenth offence, and I'm old enough to know better; but you will remember that it was the Judge, not the Accused, who "couldn't see the necessity.") Well, in one of my W. P. B. Prefaces I had penned some words which struck me as harmonising with "Y.'s" plaints. Here followeth a suppressed passage from that Unpublished Atrocity:

No one is expected to remember the examples in a text-book of arithmetic or algebra; no one ought to be expected to remember the multitude of details contained in a text-book of history. It suffices to read and understand, then forget. Of course this is but a counsel of perfection; while examiners expect one to remember what historical events are associated with the names of Banaster, Berkeley, Felton, Pleshey, and Pularoon! But my solemn advice to the reader of this book is: use the facts contained herein as a child does a box of bricks; play with them; learn how to make them into all sorts of pretty patterns; and, when you take them into the examination room, pelt the examiner with them. (Pelt him hard, for there is a certain reciprocity even in the examination room; if you mark him well, he'll mark you well.) And, when you've finished throwing your bricks about, don't trouble to collect them; leave them there and come away, a lighter and a gladder man.

All I want you to remember of this book is contained in the first three pages. If you read the other three hundred pages of the book, you will be able to understand the summary of English history contained in the first three pages. And if you remember that summary because you have worked through the data on which it is based, you will have gone through an historical training which will enable you to consult intelligently the reference books which will tell you more accurately than your memory the date of the Great Boer Trek or the parentage of Guy Fawkes.

Sorry to quote myself at such portentous length; but if you follow the argument (remembering that it is a W. P. B. Preface, not the Finished Product of a Fourteen-Fold Book-maker) you will perceive how the passage partly sympathises with, and partly answers the argument of "Y." Granted that too much stress is still laid on storing the mind with useless knowledge, and too little on training the mind to "go and find out and be damned"; but is not the cultivation of the memory better than no mental training at all? Are we not really growing a little less instructional, and a little more educational than in the school-days of "Y." and myself? (I couple our names together because I, too, was "a clever chap." You will find my name high up in the Cambridge Local Lists somewhere in the early eighties. I would give the year and place if I could remember them.) And is it not possible that doing all those grim sums, and—not knowing but—learning exactly where "ivory, apes, and peacocks" were grown, helped to lift "Y." to his present position of writing for several reputable papers? Is it not mean of the man to leer at the lad's ladder? Is it not probable that the process of acquiring "the knowledge that was" has helped to endow "Y." with "the power that is"?—I am, &c., STRANKS.

Our Prize Competitions.

Result of No. 9 (New Series).

In the Letters of Robert Louis Stevenson is this abstract of an imaginary novel by Fielding:

"I am enjoying Solomon Crabb extremely; Solomon's capital adventure with the two highwaymen and Squire Trecothick and Parson Vance; it is as good, I think, as anything in Joseph Andrews. I have just come to the part where the highwayman with the black patch over his eye has tricked poor Solomon into his place, and the squire and the parson are hearing the evidence. Parson Vance is splendid. How good, too, is old Mrs. Crabb and the coastguardman in the third chapter, or her delightful quarrel with the sexton of Seaham; Lord Conybeare is, surely, a little overdone; but I don't know either; he's such damned fine sport. Do you like Sally Barnes? I'm in love with her. Constable Muddon is as good as Dogberry and Verges put together; when he takes Solomon to the cage, and the highwayman gives him Solomon's own guinea for his pains, and kisses Mrs. Muddon, and just then up drives Lord Conybeare, and instead of helping Solomon, calls him all the rascals in Christendom—O, Henry Fielding, Henry Fielding! Yet perhaps the scenes at Seaham are the best. But I'm bewildered among all these excellences."

We asked our competitors to apply a similar effort of fancy to Jane Austen, and the result has been excellent and a proof of the closeness with which that author is still read. Altogether we like best the following contribution by Miss Evelyn Underhill, 3, Campden Hill-place, W.:

I am revelling in Affection and Affectation, which Jane Austen, alas! did not live to complete. The Rev. Dr. Pervis, with his pomposity, his snuff, and his "responsible position as shepherd of a flock," equals Mr. Collins. Mrs. Pervis, too, in whom a plump and placid exterior hides an astute and calculating mind, and who revises her husband's sermons with an eye to the failings of his congregation—how well she is drawn! I don't know which of their daughters I prefer: Maria, elegant and accomplished, who "knows several Latin quotations, and loves to assist the aged and distressed," or Eliza, all impulse, energy, and affection. That is a good scene where the gouty old squire, whom Maria visits and waits on like a devoted grand-daughter, surprises her by an offer of marriage, and adds (being in the habit of soliloquising aloud): "The young woman would make an excellent nurse." Eliza's love affair, too, with the squire's bashful son, who is finally led to declare himself by Mrs. Pervis's judicious allusions to his gallant reputation, and Miss Bemrose, the genteel spinster from London, are as good as anything in Pride and Prejudice. Mordaunt, perhaps, is a poor villain, and the device whereby he is unmasked a little weak; but much can be forgiven the creator of Captain Vincent, the breezy old salt whose blunders are so necessary to the plot, and whose son, the inevitable curate, was obviously intended to console the disconsolate Maria.

Among the best of the others are these:

Have you read Passion and Propriety yet? I am finding it most delightful. I particularly enjoy the discussion on the merits of the sprigged muslin and the white and silver poplin between Miss Delany and Louisa Fairfield. I must own that Louisa is, perhaps, "too good, too excellent, a creature" for my taste, but then, what an admirable foil to the impulsive Isabella! I hope you will sympathise with me in my partiality for Miss Delany, with her profound respect for all that is comme il faut. How charming, too, is old Mrs. Gubbins: the scene in which she and Miss Gunnery cap malades against each other is inimitable.

Captain Everett is one of Miss Austen's very best men, and, on the whole, I think I prefer him to Captain Wentworth in Persuasion. But, of course, Mr. Hutchings is the best character in the book; his self-complacency is so convincing, and his remarks upon "the gallant defenders of our country" so admirably suited to the man. No wonder that Isabella rebelled!

I have just reached the description of the rout at Lady Ellison's. I tremble to think what will happen to Isabella and Desborough: surely she must see how worthless he is!

But what a misfortune that the book was never finished. However, let us rejoice that we have rescued even this slight fragment by the gentle Jane.

[S. H. H., London.]

I have made some new friends lately, and one of them already rivals Elizabeth Bennet in my affections. Why have I never read Barland Towers before? Sophia Meldrum is simply adorable! Also she has more spice of devilry than Elizabeth. In those inimitable conversations with Colonel Pettigrew, so demure she is that the sharpness of her wit quite escapes him. The incident of the spectacle case is not convincing; but, of course, if Miss Inches had not looked out then, Mr. Liddell would never have heard of it at all. But we all know plot is not Miss Austen's strong point. I long to meet a Mrs. Lebrun in the flesh. The very thought of her will henceforth cheer my dullest moments. When she and Betsy arrange newspapers on all the drawing-room chairs, and a sheet on the carpet, do you not think of Cranford and the paper paths to the chairs at Miss Jenkyn's party? Could anything be more delightful? I don't think much care for the men, and cannot think what Mary Lebrun saw in Mr. Liddell; but the Miss Inches, Mary herself, and Mrs. Pettigrew will keep me happy for a month. And dear Sophia Meldrum! Fickle though I am, my affection for you will never wane, for you are always charming. In my garden at night I often think of the paste buckles you bought at the fair, and see them flash as you run past me like a hare in the dark.

[M. M. B., St. Andrews.]

What do you think I have found? Why, a MS., positively a rejected MS. of Jane Austen's. The story, which is entitled Honour and Humility, is delightful—fresh, humorous, demure. Caroline Ashton is the only daughter of the Lady Maria Ashton. You can imagine the charming sort of heroine, with the naïveté of a Catherine and the natural timidity of an Anne Elliot. She has met, at a dancing-party in the county-town, James Watson, "a beggarly apothecary's son," as Lady Maria calls him. True the young man is a paragon of virtue, quotes Gray's "Elegy," and is excessively gentleman-like. But Caroline's mother tramples on his aspirations and tries in many spirited conversations to stir up her lethargic spouse to forbid his approaching her daughter. She proceeds herself to active measures, and sends to Ireland for her distant cousin, a young Mr. Edward Fitzgerald, who is heir to an unencumbered estate, and who falls an easy prey to Caroline's charms immediately on his arrival at Ashton Chase. Caroline is somewhat carried away by her kinsman's dash, but her affections are still definitely engaged by Watson's superiority of intellect, and well knowing that the ending will be a happy one for all parties (for never does Miss Austen harrow our feelings by blighted hopes or broken hearts) I am anxiously awaiting a solution of the riddle. Possibly it may be found in the arrival of the new parson's three daughters, one of whom is reported to have a lively tongue."

Competition No. 10 (New Series).

A correspondent draws our attention to one or two well-known lines which can be transposed so as to convey an opposite sense without suffering any injury from the process. "Thus," he says, "Milton's

'New Presbyterian is but old Priest writ large' should plainly read

'Old Priest is but New Presbyterian writ large.'

The New Presbyterian was not much to brag about, but he was an advance upon his predecessor. Or Pope's should be read with the last word altered to 'wrong'—or evolution is a mistake."

'One truth is clear—whatever is is right'

Without committing ourselves to heart-and-soul agreement with our correspondent, we think that, at any rate, the game of transposition as outlined in his letter may employ our readers' ingenuity rather amusingly, and we therefore offer a prize of a guinea to the competitor who sends the best example. The lines chosen for treatment must, we should add, be well known.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, November 28. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the first column of p. 612 or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers.

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

RECOLLECTIONS, 1832 TO 1886. BY SIR ALGERNON WEST.

Sir Algernon West has led a busy life as a civil servant of the Crown, and he was the private secretary and friend of Mr. Gladstone. Born in 1832, he can look back on a long and interesting past. His "recollections" fill two volumes and abound in anecdote. (Smith, Elder & Co. 21s.)

THAT REMINDS ME. BY SIR EDWARD RUSSELL.

The busy editor of the Liverpool Daily Post says: "A working newspaper editor of a good many years' experience, I find that numerous occurrences or statements which come before me in my daily work remind me of incidents and conversations which live in my memory." (Unwin.)

THE HIGHEST ANDES. BY E. A. FITZGERALD.

This is Mr. FitzGerald's record of the successful attempt made by himself and his colleagues, Mr. Stuart Vines, Mr. Arthur Lightbody, and Mr. Philip Gosse, to climb to the hitherto untrodden summit of Aconcagua, the highest mountain in the Andes and in America. In all its outward appearance the book is worthy of the importance of its subject, the illustrations being particularly fine. (Methuen.)

GREEK TERRA-COTTA STATUETTES. BY MARCUS B. HUISH.

"Exquisite and fragile marvels, on which the genius of expiring Greece amused itself." Such is the quoted description of Greek statuettes on the title-page of Mr. Huish's comely and alluring volume. These beautiful, homely productions of ancient Greece, which stood on the housewife's shelves or were placed on the tombs of the dead, have been curiously neglected by English students. Mr. Huish's work throws a flood of light on the subject. (Murray.)

A NEW RIDE TO KHIVA. BY R. L. JEFFERSON.

Mr. Jefferson rode from Catford to Khiva, mainly "because so many people said it was impossible." Out of the whole journey of six thousand miles less than a hundred were covered by other means than the bicycle. This is Mr. Jefferson's well-illustrated record of his journey. (Methuen. 6s.)

IMPRESSIONS OF SOUTH AFRICA. BY JAMES BRYCE.

This new edition of Mr. Bryce's work, carefully revised, and containing reflections on the present war with the Transvaal, will be useful to a great many readers who wish to form or renew just conceptions of the South African problem. For Mr. Bryce's disapproval of the war does not interfere with his clear and statesmanlike view of the large questions involved. (Macmillan.)

A CRITICAL HISTORY OF THE DOCTRINE OF A FUTURE LIFE. BY R. H. CHARLES, D.D.

Dr. Charles is Professor of Biblical Greek at Trinity College, Dublin, and this book is the fruit of many years' study. The doctrine of a future life is examined historically in connexion with Israel, Judaism, and Christianity, and Dr. Charles's whole line of study and investigation has been one of original scholarship. The conclusions embodied in this book were communicated by Dr. Charles in the Jowett Lectures of 1898-99. (A. & C. Black.)

ON BOOKS AND ARTS.

BY FREDERICK WEDMORE.

Mr. Wedmore was ever a fastidious critic; and his own writings do not escape his scrutiny, for in a prefatory note he tells us that he has gathered up only those of his contributions to various Reviews and to the Standard which he is "least unwilling" to preserve within the covers of a book. Mr. Wedmore's subjects are: "The Short Story," "Balzac," "George Eliot," "Siddons and Rachel," "Rembrandt," "Dutch Seventeenth-Century Drawings," "Velasquez," and other dainty and distinguished subjects. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

THE ESSAYS AND MORE ESSAYS OF ELIA.

BY CHARLES LAMB.

This is a very pretty edition, in two volumes, of the Elia essays. So far as we are aware, it is the first serious attempt to illustrate Lamb's writings. Old lovers of Lamb may be impatient of illustrations, but the unfledged Elia will doubtless delight in Mr. Charles E. Brock's dainty and often highly expressive drawings. The introduction is by Mr. Birrell. (Dent.)

* * Owing to great pressure on our space, acknowledgments of other New Books are held over. New Novels are acknowledged elsewhere.

Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volume of the ACADEMY can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 9d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher, 43, Chancery-lane.

JANE H. ADEANE,

Editor of "The Girlhood of Maria Josepha Holroyd."

8vo, 18s. [Next week.

* * Many of the readers of the "Girlhood of Maria Josepha Holroyd" have asked whether there are no letters of her married life equally worthy of being preserved; and have suggested that, if such be the case, a selection from them would form a welcome companion to the bright letters of her earlier days.

To this question the present volume is an answer. It consists of extracts from Sir J. T. Stanley's MSS. up to the time of his marriage, and afterwards of selections from the correspondence of his wife, Maria Josepha, which tell the story of the early years of a married life that lasted over half a century (1796 to 1850).

Crown 8vo, handsomely bound in cloth gilt, 5s.
"Concerned with phases and disabilities of modern life under

By G. BARNETT SMITH, Author of "History of the English Parliament," "Life of Gladstone," &c.

Vol. I.—WELLINGTON, GARIBALDI, GORDON, GRANT.

Vol. II.—NELSON, NAPIER, LIVINGSTONE, ROBERTS.

Large crown 8vo, well illustrated, cloth gilt, bevelled boards, gilt edges, price 5s. each volume.

SIR PATRICK: THE PUDDOCK.

By L. B. WALFORD, Author of "The Archdeacon," "Mr. Smith," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

GHOSTS: BEING THE EXPERIENCES OF FLAXMAN LOW.

By K. and HESKETH PRICHARD (E. and H. HARRON), Authors of "Tammer's Duel," &c. Illustrated by B. E. Mians. Crown 8vo, price 6s.

The Most Successful Fiction.

MR. JACK HAMLIN'S MEDIATION, AND OTHER STORIES.

By BRET HARTE, Author of "Stories in Light and Shadow," "Tales of the Pacific Slope," &c. Crown 8vo, price 6s.

"Jack Hamlin is the best trump in a well-stocked hand of captivating characters. In the graphic word-sketch—a mere psychological study outlined with the touch of a master—which gives its title to Mr. Harte's latest collection of raconteurs, Hamlin is again the central and commanding figure, his splendid physical and intellectual vigour offering a fine contrast to the uncouth dulness of the man and the feeble frivolity of the woman whom he audaciously extricates from a connubial misunderstanding that had threatened to wreck the happiness of both their lives. The remaining stories of the series, seven in number, display all the most engaging characteristics of Mr. Harte's best fictional work."—Daily Telegraph.

THE DREGS OF WRATH.

By WALTER E. GROGAN, Author of "The Adventures of a War Correspondent." Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

"Plenty of fire and variety make it a readable and lively book."—Morning Leader.

PHIL OF THE HEATH.

By HAROLD CHILD. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

"So absorbingly interesting as to make its perusal at a sitting almost imperative, well written and abounding with situations and incidents dramatic in their intensity."—Dundee Advertiser.

HERONFORD.

By S. R. KEIGHTLEY, Author of "The Silver Cross," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

"Those who care to unravel a tangled skein of family interest, with twists and turns of crime, love, and passion, will here find something to their liking. The action takes place both on land and sea, and Dr. S. R. Keightley proves as competent to describe a fight on ocean as a ghost hunt in the grey house of Heronford. Several of the characters are powerfully drawn, and become wonderfully human; but it is in action and colour-effects that Dr. Keightley shows the master hand, and he gives here some work as fine as any that has appeared since Stevenson."—Dundee Advertiser.

A BITTER VINTAGE.

By K. DOUGLAS KING, Author of "The Scripture Reader of St. Mark's," "Father Hilarion," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

"There is a delicacy of touch and an artistic rendering of much that in less skilled hands would be coarse and revolting. The hero, Tony Steel, is a famous music-hall singer, and the girl Caryl, whom he had loved since the old days when he and she had belonged to the same travelling troupe, is a brilliant picture of beauty, fine affections, and wit; her forced marriage with the man she hated is well explained and described. The book is one of the most powerful I have read for a long time."—Gentlewoman.

THE EMPEROR'S CANDLESTICKS.

By Baroness EMMUSKA OROZY. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

"Can be unhesitatingly commended. The interest is maintained from first to last.....the plot is cleverly worked out."—Athenaeum.

The Book of the Year.

THE FURTHER ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN KETTLE.

By C. J. CUTCLIFFE HYNÉ. Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood. Crown 8vo, cloth, uniform with first volume, price 6s.

"This delightful volume is likely to be not only one of the most read, but also one of the most talked of works of fiction issued during the autumn season. Unlike some fictional heroes whose names have become world-renowned, Captain Kettle's personality does not entirely dwarf those in his immediate vicinity; other characters there are to be found connected with his life history who are quite worth making acquaintance with."—World.

"Never has a hero won the heart of the public so spontaneously as this fire-eating little sailor whose name has become as familiar and as typical as Dickens's Captain Cuttle.....Those who have read his early adventures will need no recommendation to follow his further career; those who have not, we strongly advise to repair the omission at once. What Lord Kitchener is in history, Captain Kettle is in fiction—the man of the year."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

SIR ALGERNON WEST'S REMINISCENCES.

RECOLLECTIONS, 1832 to 1886.

By the Right Hon. Sir ALGERNON WEST, K.C.B.,

For many years Private Secretary to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, and subsequently Chairman of the Inland Revenue Board.

Times.—"Sir Algernon West's 'Recollections' will at once take rank among the books which everybody must read. They are not only in the main extremely entertaining, but in many points throw valuable light upon the political history of the period they cover."
Standard.—"Written with freedom from egotism, with simplicity, discrimination, and faultless taste... Both volumes can be read with unflagging interest, and the certainty that as each page is turned there will be something on the next to keep the attention on the alert if not to excite a laugh."
Manchester Guardian.—"The book is like its author. It is kind, it is amusing, it is discreet, it is full of knowledge, it puts everyone on good terms with himself, and makes even a soured and embittered reader fancy for the moment that the world is a better place than he has actually found it."

 "Concerned with phases and disabilities of modern life under high pressure, as seen from the point of view of a nurse, and all display literary power of no ordinary kind. Cambridge Review.

"A series of studies, grim and humorous, fanciful and pathetic.....The pleasant mixture is dedicated to Mrs. Thomas Hardy."
Academy.

"A volume of clever sketches. Indeed, there is more than cleverness in them. There is feeling, often expressed with no little subtlety and skill, and plenty of humour. Some of the stories are of the strangest."
Spectator.

"Stories and sketches.....There is not one which is not of its kind perfect."

Glasgow Herald.

A THRILLING ROMANCE BY A NEW WRITER.

I LIVED as I LISTED. By Alfred L. MAITLAND. With Etched Title and Frontispiece from a design by A. G. Walker. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

BY THE POPULAR AUTHOR OF "THREE GIRLS IN A FLAT," "A HAUNTED TOWN," &c.

MARGET at the MANSE. By Ethel F. HEDDLE. With Illustrations and Cover designed by Gordon Browne. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

THREE GIRLS in a FLAT. By ETHEL F. HEDDLE. Illustrated by Gordon Browne, R.I. [Second Edition.]

A HAUNTED TOWN. By Ethel F. HEDDLE. With Illustrations and Cover Design by Gordon Browne, R.I. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards.

"Lovers of St. Andrews will welcome this story, and as there is a great multitude scattered all over the world, the book ought to have the success which it certainly deserves. Miss Heddle is especially clever in weaving old history into the framework of a modern love-story. She knows the past of St. Andrews, and one can hear the footsteps of Queens and Cardinals still echoing among its haunted ruins, and in the old-world gardens behind the houses of South Street.....It is a beautiful book, and one on which the reviewer is tempted to linger. No sea town has a richer or more precious literature of its own than St. Andrews, and there are passages in this book well worthy to be placed beside the descriptions of Andrew Lang and Mrs. Oliphant."

British Weekly.

SAUNTERINGS in BOOKLAND with GLEANINGS by the WAY. Gathered by JOSEPH SHAYLOR. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d., printed on laid paper, extra cloth boards, gilt top, with Frontispiece of "The Reader" after a picture by Meissonier. Red and Black Title-Page.

THE POWER of WOMANHOOD, or MOTHERS and SONS. A Book for Parents and those in Loco Parentis. By ELLICE HOPKINS. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

CHICKABIDDY STORIES. By EDMUND MITCHELL, Author of "Toward's the Eternal Snow," "The Temple of Death," &c. Illustrated by Norman H. Hardy. 16mo, fancy cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

"Some of the 'Chickabiddy Stories' which Mr. Edmund Mitchell tells are in prose, and some are in rhyme. But they are all of the kind that our 'chickabiddies' are sure to appreciate and to enjoy, and which they will get Nurse to read to them over and over again. When they are tired of that they will still have the pretty pictures to fall back upon, and there are enough of them to fill up the time between tea and bed in a very pleasant manner indeed."

Glasgow Herald.

TALITHA CUMI. A Letter to Laura, Sister of Dick. By JAMES ADDERLEY, Author of "The New Floreat." Fcap. 8vo, title and cover in red and black, sewed, 1s.

CHATTO &amp; WINDUS, PUBLISHERS

THE SIREN'S WEB. A Romance of London Society. By ANNIE THOMAS. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

THINGS I HAVE SEEN IN WAR. By IRVING MONTAGU. With 16 Full-Page Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE GOLDEN IDOL. By J. Emmerson MUDDOCK. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"Mr. Muddock once wandered in New Guinea, dodging death by sharks and miasma. This stirring tale of adventure is founded on his youthful experiences. The Golden Idol was a mythical treasure said to have been taken from Japan in the seventeenth century to New Guinea by pirates, who were wrecked and served up by the natives in stew and stew." Academy.

TALES OF TERROR. By Dick Donovan. Author of "A Detective's Triumphs." Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"Tales of Terror" are indeed of the blood-curdling variety, calculated to make you hurry up the cold and creaking staircase after nightfall, almost feeling some dread and undefinable presence at your heels. — Morning Leader.

THE SHIP: HER STORY. By W. Clark RUSSELL. With 50 Illustrations by H. C. SKIFFERS. Waiver. Small 4to, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"In 'The Ship' Mr. Clark Russell gives us another proof that his charm is as great as ever. On a level with Mr. Clark Russell's writing is the admirable work of Mr. Seppings Wright as illustrator. Apart from its interest to men who have to do with the sea, this is the very book to give to a boy or girl at Christmas." — Black and White.

BOHEMIAN PARIS OF TO-DAY. By W. C. MORROW. With 106 Illustrations by EDOUARD CUCUEL. Small 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"These intimate revelations of Mr. Morrow and M. Cucuel are one of the most delightful surprises of the present literary season. People who wish to retain their respectability, and at the same time to acquire an intimate knowledge of the doings and sayings of Bohemian life in Paris, will do well to get hold of Mr. Morrow's delightful letterpress and of M. Cucuel's equally delightful illustrations." — Social Review.

LONDON SOUVENIRS. By C. W. HECKETHORN. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"We know of no more delightful or fascinating hobby than collecting books dealing with London and London life. Here is the latest. Mr. Heckethorn is a most agreeable companion, garrulous, but never tiresome or dull." — Daily Chronicle.

SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE ORANGE GIRL. By Sir Walter BESANT. FIFTH EDITION. With 8 Illustrations by FRED PEGRAM.

"The story is admirable, especially as regards the character of the fascinating heroine. This brilliant young girl begins life as a beauty of St. Giles's, and might have ended as a beauty of St. James's. She is a delightful and charming creature. The scene of mad revenge is the most powerful of several powerful passages, and the story from first to last does not flag in picturesque spirit and interest." — Daily Chronicle.

TERENCE. By B. M. Croker, with 6 Illustrations.

"One always opens one of Mrs. B. M. Croker's novels with the certain hope of an hour's genuine enjoyment; and 'Terence' is quite equal to Mrs. Croker's best work. Mrs. Croker's story rattles along over the surface of life as the Irish coach rattled down the road to Ballybay. And it ends as happily." — World.

MRS. DUNBAR'S SECRET. By Alan ST. AUBYN. Author of "A Fellow of Trinity."

"For those who have humour and experience, 'Mrs. Dunbar's Secret' may provide good entertainment." — Speaker.

A CRIMSON CRIME. By Geo. Manville FENN. SECOND EDITION.

EXPLORATIO EVANGELICA:

A Brief Examination of the Basis and Origin of Christian Belief. By PERCY GARDNER, Litt. D.

"How can a man disbelieve a large part of Christian religion and yet be a devout Christian? Sollicitus ambulando. Mr. Gardner does it. And, of course, he is only one specimen of the many examples which prove the possibility of living by the light of a reconstructed theology. The spectacle of the examples must always be the main evidence of the possibility, and for that reason it is well that they should be multiplied, even when they fall very far short of the learning, and the sobriety, and the restrained intensity of the 'Exploratio Evangelica.' — The Speaker.

AFTER BIG GAME IN CENTRAL

AFRICA: Records of a Sportsman from August, 1894, to November, 1897, when Crossing the Dark Continent from the Mouth of the Zambesi to the French Congo. With a Map of the Route and over 60 Illustrations. By EDOUARD FOA, F.R.G.S. Translated from the French, with an Introduction by F. LEES.

"It is, beyond any possibility of doubt, the production, not only of a hard-working explorer thoroughly conversant with the toils and dangers of the African interior, but of a first-rate sportsman, who, without being a butcher, has been extraordinarily successful in the pursuit of the rarer and larger of the wild fauna of the country. This is a really excellent sporting book." — The Saturday Review.

The Literary Week.

RUMOURS as to the condition of affairs in the American firm of Harper & Brothers are somewhat exaggerated. There are heavy debts, it is true, but the assets, although not realisable at once, more than cover them. The assignment will mean reorganisation, with Mr. Harvey, of the North American Review, at the head. Says the New York Evening Post: "The changes in progress are merely preparatory to a career of renewed vitality, increased energy, and extending influence for the house without materially changing its character." Meanwhile the Harper-McClure combination has been dissolved.

THE fact is, the magazine war in America has lately been very acute, and some of the older and infinitely better periodicals, such as Harper's, have suffered. At the present moment America has too many magazines. Among them are the Century, Harper's, Munsey's, McClure's, Scribner's, The Cosmopolitan, Frank Leslie's Monthly, Demorest's, Lippincott's, The Strand, and many others, mostly at ten cents. It is the ten-cent. magazine, packed with pictures and reading matter, and very well done indeed, which has injured the highest class, to which Harper's belongs.

MRS. CRAIGIE'S new poetical play, "Osborn and Ursyne," was produced with great success at the Empire Theatre, New York, on Wednesday night.

THE death of Dr. Charles M. Hyde, of Honolulu, which occurred recently, has escaped general notice; yet, at a time when Stevenson's Letters are being read everywhere, attention should certainly be drawn to it, for thereby passes away the man to whom the most famous letter of all was addressed—that which, under the title "Father Damien," first appeared in the National Observer, and was afterwards reprinted as a pamphlet. The Boston Literary World, which describes Stevenson's letter as vindictive, states that it has it "upon very high authority that Stevenson was led before his death to see the subject in a somewhat different light, and even went so far as to admit that in his treatment of Dr. Hyde he had laid himself open to very heavy penalty." We should like to have further information concerning this matter.

No appointment has been yet made to the editorship of the Daily Chronicle. Two prominent members of the staff have also sent in their resignations. The conduct of the paper is, at present, in the hands of Mr. Fisher, who occupied the editorial chair with ability during Mr. Massingham's illness in the summer. It was Mr. Massingham who first gave to the literary page of the Daily Chronicle its special distinction.

APROPOS the publication of the huge Encyclopædia Biblica, the first volume of which we review this week, we may not unfittingly quote a passage concerning the Bible of Cromwell's day from Mr. Morley's essay on Cromwell in the December Century:

Cromwell's Bible was not what the Bible is to-day. Criticism, comparative, chronological, philological, historical, had not impaired its position as the direct word of God, a single book, one and whole, one page as inspired as another, one text as binding as another . . . The God to whom Cromwell in heart as in speech appealed was no "stream of tendency," no "supernaturalistic hypothesis," but the Lord of Hosts of the Old Testament. The saints and Puritans were the chosen people. All the denunciations of the prophets against the oppressors of Israel were applied to the letter against bishops and princes. And Moses and Joshua, Gideon and Barak, Samson and Jephthah, were the antitypes of those who now in a Christian world thought themselves called, like those heroes of old time, to stop the mouths of lions and turn to fight the armies of the aliens.

IN the same number of the Century we find the following reversed maxim, which is more or less in keeping with our Prize Competition this week, and has some bearing on the present situation:

We're reversing old maxims of late, or
We're getting exceedingly near it.
To heroes in action we cater,
And this is the way that you hear it:
"He that taketh a city is greater Than he who just ruleth his spirit."

MR. FREDERIC MINES writes: "I have just received from Genoa the local newspaper, Caffaro, in which is a beautiful translation of Mr. Kipling's popular war-poem. The title is rendered 'Il mendicante distratto.' Passing over the adjective, which is a curious enough translation of 'absent-minded,' what are we to think of 'mendicante'—mendicant, or literally 'beggar'? The poor translator is evidently not well versed in English colloquialisms. And what will Italians think of our soldiers, and of our opinion of our soldiers, that we should consider them distracted mendicants? There are many funny things in the translation; I will trouble you with only one more. Against 'Son of a Lambeth publican' ('Figlio d'un liquorista di Lambeth') there is an asterisk, denoting an explanatory footnote, which is—would you believe it?—'Krüger.'"

IT may be worth while pointing out, that while the sum of £775, which is the total sum paid for Mr. Rudyard Kipling's poem, "The Absent-Minded Beggar," is very large, it is not the greatest ever given for a piece of verse. For example, James Smith, one of the authors of the famous Rejected Addresses, happened to meet Mr. Strachan, the King's printer, at a dinner party, and found him suffering much from gout. In spite of this the old gentleman enjoyed Smith's brilliant conversation extremely, and they parted with many good wishes. Next day the author sent Strachan a jeu d'esprit of eight lines, which so pleased the recipient that he added a codicil to his will the same day, leaving the author the sum of £3,000. A brief calculation will show that this payment is at the rate of £375 a line.

AN illustrated edition of Matthew Arnold's poems, no matter what its merits, is probably not among the more pressing needs of any admirer of the poet. Arnold does not require illustrations. But if, following the law which dictates that certain books must be illustrated for Christmas presents, pictures are provided for "The Forsaken Merman," and "Requiescat," and "The Scholar Gipsy," we could wish them to be simpler and clearer and less dreary than those which Mr. Henry Ospovat has put to an edition of Arnold published by Mr. Lane. It is time, indeed, that the convention which Mr. Ospovat pursues so relentlessly was killed. In Rossetti's hands it was rich and satisfying, but it is not so with his distant followers.

WE are, however, glad to have this edition of Arnold for Mr. A. C. Benson's interesting Introduction. We quote the opening passage :

It is but a few weeks since I stood in the churchyard at Laleham; the inconspicuous church with its massive ivy-grown tower, the cool gloom of the branching yews, the little precinct crowded with tasteless graves, the dust of traffic on the fringing hedges, made an allegory. The place seems meant for sober peace, and yet it misses the charm of tranquillity. This ancient river-side hamlet, after its centuries of solitude, invaded by a careless, pleasure-loving throng, appears to strive for a compromise, a reconciliation. It seems tired of faithful silence, and yet bewildered by the incursion of triflers whom it cannot win to acquiescence in its grave solemnities. Was that not true of its famous son?

MR. BENSON refers thus to his own personal recollections of Arnold :

The present writer had the good fortune, when a young man, to meet him several times, and each time to have been treated with the same exquisitely gracious semi-paternal bonhomie, to have been listened to with serious attention, and to have been met with a melancholy respect which had in it no touch of undue condescension. . . . Quite apart from his writings, but in virtue of them, he fulfilled the almost sacerdotal function of upholding in a high degree the dignity of the literary character. To the uninitiated barbarian this dignity was viewed as a mere donnishness; but to any that understood him, the grace, urbanity, and loftiness of his whole attitude was unmistakable. Every moment passed in his presence confirmed the spectator in this belief: one felt that, in whatever society he might find himself, he would always be a great personage. This atmosphere of dignity rose not from any restless wish to enforce his claims to respect upon the circle that surrounded him, but from a certain native princeliness which, without obvious or irritating conceit, made him regard his own mind in somewhat the same fashion that Napoleon regarded his destiny—as holding a kind of natural dictatorship over other minds.

The last time Mr. Benson saw Arnold was at Windermere Station. "Somehow he seemed more congenial to the bristling human throng than if one had seen him striding alone among the fells."

THE protest recently raised in this paper by "Z." against the use of Gray's "Elegy" as an "elocutionary whetstone" in schools is the text of a long article in the Chicago Dial. Our contributor's position seems again to be needlessly misunderstood. In dismissing Gray's "Elegy" from the schoolroom he by no means sought to banish all masterpieces of literature from the rough usage of the reading-class. On the contrary, he particularly recommended Shakespeare's plays and any other masterpieces in which the average boy might find a foothold for his attention. But he denied that Gray's "Elegy" gives to the average boy this foothold. He contended (rightly or wrongly) that this particular poem is not merely difficult, but is very distasteful to the average boy, and that the effect of its present excessive use in the reading-class is, in most cases, to ruin the poem as a comforter in after life. The Dial quotes a passage from Robert Louis Stevenson's Ebb Tide to show how the half-grasped lines of Virgil persist in the mind, and irradiate it, through life. Of course this gradual and persisting efflorescence is exactly what "Z." affirmed was to be aimed at in introducing classics to the schoolroom. He only contended that it rarely follows the introduction of Gray's "Elegy."

Two more volumes in the "New Century Library" of fiction, which Messrs. Nelson are issuing, have reached us—Nicholas Nickleby and Vanity Fair. The India paper on which they are printed—and printed in quite a good-sized, clear type—enables them to be slipped into the pocket without the least inconvenience, although the Dickens volume runs to 880 pages and the Thackeray to 784.

THE following scrap of autobiography is extracted from Mr. Lang's "Sign of the Ship" in the December Longman's Magazine:

I wish I had kept my own unsuccessful Newdigates! They would not sell for £115, but they would amuse their author. I had a try at "Marie Antoinette," about 1867, beginning with a rapt description of the Lisbon earthquake, which happened about the time when the poor lady was born. I did it as much as I could like Mr. Swinburne: examiners did not rise to it. I rather think Mr. Courthope was the winner. At all events, the winner was not Swinburnian. I also did Mexico, in the manner of Captain Mayne Reid, but did not send it in. Ah! and how I wish I had kept my first novel on Queen Mary! The plot was adequate. Queen Elizabeth, entering Scotland in male costume, is mistaken for Darnley, and is blown up in the Kirk of Field. Darnley escapes to England, and passes the rest of his life disguised as Queen Elizabeth. That was why Queen Elizabeth was never married. At that time I did not know that Sir James Melville had proposed to Elizabeth to come to Scotland with him, disguised as his page. I remember that Shakespeare attended the disguised Elizabeth (about 1565!), and always spoke in blank verse.

WE find in the Magnet, the little periodical belonging to University College, Bristol, an entertaining paper on "Life in a Mediæval University," by Dr. Hastings Rashdall. The Statutes of the Oxford Hall, as revised about the year 1480, have recently come to light, and they yield some amusing details, particularly concerning fines. Among them we note these: For lateness at meals, 1d.; for laughing or talking at grace, 1d.; "unhonest jubulations," or scurrilous words, 1d.; preventing others from studying by clamour, vociferation, or musical instruments, 1d.; revealing the secrets of the Hall, 12d.; bringing a friend to meal or lecture without leave, 2d.; bringing an unsheathed knife to table, 1d.; wearing arms, 12d., with forfeiture of weapons; assaulting fellow, but without effusion of blood, 3s. 4d.; ditto, with effusion, 6s. 8d.

DR. RASHDALL has drawn up the following table of student routine in those days:

- 5.30 a.m. Rise, drink a flagon of beer at the buttery; no other breakfast.
- 6—8. Ordinary Lecture in the Public Schools (no fire; rushes on floor).
- 8. Mass (in early middle ages optional—later, compulsory).
- 9—11. Study in room with three companions—perhaps "repeating" to each other morning's lecture. No fire; no glass in windows.
- 11. Dinner. Bible read in Hall. Menu: Soup thickened with oatmeal, beef, bread, cheese, small beer.
- 11.30. College Disputation.
- 12. The idle man takes a walk, or plays dice at the tavern; the studious returns to his books.
- 1.30. Nunchions, i.e., a drink of beer in Hall.
- 2—3.30. Extraordinary Lecture.

- 3.30—5. Ditto.
 5. Supper. Much as at dinner.
 5.30—8. Study for the serious; roaming about the streets for the frivolous.
 8. Curfew rings. "Potations" in Hall.
 9. Run round quadrangle to warm feet. Bed.

We find in the Boston Literary World an account of the Stout Free Travelling Library, which is an organisation by

BOOK MARK.

"Once upon a time" a Library Book was overheard talking to a little boy who had just borrowed it. The words seemed worth recording, and here they are:

"Please don't handle me with dirty hands. I should feel ashamed to be seen when the next little boy borrowed me.

Or leave me out in the rain. Books can catch cold as well as children.

Or make marks on me with your pen or pencil. It would spoil my looks.

Or lean on me with your elbows when you are reading me. It hurts. Or open me and lay me face down on the table. You wouldn't like to be treated so.

Or put in between my leaves a pencil or anything thicker than a single sheet of thin paper. It would strain my back.

Whenever you are through reading me, if you are afraid of losing your place, don't turn down the corner of one of my leaves, but have a neat little Book Mark to put in where you stopped, and then close me and lay me down on my side, so that I can have a good, comfortable rest.

Remember that I want to visit a great many other little boys after you are through with me. Besides, I may meet you again some day, and you would be sorry to see me looking old and torn and soiled. Help me to keep fresh and clean, and I will help you to be happy."

which the scattered farm-houses and cottages in the neighbourhood of Menomonie, Wisconsin, are supplied with reading. The Travelling Library is an offshoot of the Mabel Tainter Memorial Library at Menomonie, and the books are circulated in a number of cases, each capable of holding thirty books, which are continually being changed. These cases are stationed in various centres, and each is presided over by someone willing to act as librarian. As some of the readers are not too well acquainted with the duty which is owed to a book, the quaint little book-mark which we reproduce was prepared by the late Rev. Henry Maxson.

THE second volume of Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.'s edition of the works of Charlotte Brontë and her sisters is Shirley. To this novel, as to Jane Eyre, Mrs. Humphry Ward contributes an introduction in which nothing like appreciative gush finds place. Mrs. Humphry Ward says:

There can be no question . . . that Shirley, from a literary point of view, suffered seriously from the tension and distraction of mind amid which it was composed. It has neither the unity, the agreeable old-fashioned unity of Jane Eyre, nor, as a whole, the passionate truth of Villette. In the very centre of the book the story suddenly gives way. The love-story of Robert and Caroline has somehow to be delayed; and one divines that the writer—for whom life has temporarily made impossible that fiery concentration of soul, in which a year or two later she wrote Villette—hesitates as to the love-story of Shirley and Louis. She does not see her way; she gropes a little; and that angel of imagination, to which she pays so many a glowing tribute in the course of her work, seems to droop its wing beside her, and move listlessly through two or three chapters, which do little more than mark time till the divine breath returns. These are the chapters headed "Shirley seeks to be saved by works," "Whitsun-side," "The School-Feast." They are really scene-shifting chapters while the new act is preparing; and the interval is long and the machinery a little clumsy.

In the last sentence of her Introduction, Mrs. Ward prepares her readers for the pæan of praise which she is intending to sound when Villette's turn comes. "Shirley is not so good a story, not so remarkable an achievement as Jane Eyre, but it contains none the less the promise and potency of higher things than Jane Eyre—of the brilliant, the imperishable Villette."

WHAT the popularity of Mrs. Elizabeth Turner was in her own day—that is, at the beginning of this century—we cannot say, but it was probably nothing to warrant the new editions of her little books of cautionary stories, The Daisy and The Cowslip, which the past few years have brought forth. The first reprints were made, we believe, by Mr. Walsh for Messrs. Griffith & Farran. Then came a selection from these books and others in an anthology of verse for children published by Mr. Grant Richards; then came Mrs. Turner's Cautionary Stories, in a tiny volume from the same publisher. Then Mr. Tuer's Pages and Pictures from Forgotten Children's Books referred to Mrs. Turner again, and a further instalment is to be found in his Stories from Forgotten Children's Books this year, while he now sends us fac-simile reprints of The Daisy and The Cowslip. Messrs. Cornish, of Birmingham, have also issued reprints this autumn, not in fac-simile but, with prettier effect, in a new form. In case there should be anyone still unacquainted with Mrs. Turner's muse, we quote one of her poems:

HONOUR.

As Dick and Bryan were at play
 At trap, it came to pass
 Dick struck the ball so far away,
 He broke a pane of glass.

Though much alarm'd, they did not run,
 But walked up to the spot;
 And offer'd for the damage done
 What money they had got.

When accidents like this arise,
 Dear children! this rely on,
 All honest, honourable boys
 Will act like Dick and Bryan.

For economy of words and satisfactoriness of metre Mrs. Turner cannot be beaten.

MR. D. J. O'DONOGHUE, author of The Life of Carleton, and other works, has been preparing for some years a new, revised, and greatly enlarged edition of his Dictionary of Irish Poets, the first edition of which is now almost exhausted. The new edition will include biographical notices of about 3,500 writers, and will be published in five parts by the author himself, at 19, Lincoln-place, Dublin. The first part will appear early in the new year. The price of each part will be two shillings, but to subscribers in advance the price of the whole work will be six shillings.

In referring in a recent paragraph to the late Col. Scott Chisholme's last words we omitted to mention that the telegram containing the account of his death, in which those words were first recorded, was despatched to this country by the war correspondent of the Morning Leader.

THE Hampstead Annual for 1899-1900, edited by Mr. Greville E. Matheson and Mr. Sydney C. Mayle, will be published early this month. The new volume contains articles by Canon Ainger, Dr. Richard Garnett, Prof. Hales, Mr. Arthur Waugh, and others.

AT a public library in the north of London (writes a correspondent), the management, whose policy of enterprise has won recognition in many quarters, seems of late to have developed an over-anxious solicitude for the moral welfare of its clients—or at least for such of them as have reached years of indiscretion. The malice and wickedness of Messrs. Stalky & Co., for instance, are hidden from the unwise and imprudent adult, that they may be revealed to babes. My ticket, I was told, would not avail me: the book had been assigned to the "Juvenile Department."

MR. A. B. WALKLEY, writing in the Chronicle on the attitude of the reviewed to the reviewer—or, as Stevenson puts it in the letter which forms Mr. Walkley's text, the attitude of "the grateful critickee" to the critic—contrasts English ways and French ways in this connexion. The French author who has been reviewed favourably either calls on the reviewer or sends his card. "We English," says Mr. Walkley, "are too shamefaced about these things. When critic and critickee belong to the same club, their next meeting is apt to be a painful ordeal. Between the soup and the fish the critickee musters up courage to murmur (indistinctly) that 'he read a very charming article about a certain little book this morning,' and the critic innocently replies: 'Oh, that? Glad you—h'm—h'm—hang it! why doesn't the waiter bring my toast?' And both sigh with relief over the burial of the awkward subject. Their relations are somewhat strained for at least a fortnight."

APROPOS of perpetual copyright, to which we return on another page of this number, the American publishing firm of Messrs. Rand, McNally & Co. have expressed themselves entirely in its favour. They say: "We consider the present limitation of copyright is an injustice to the author, and would most heartily commend the substitution of a perpetual copyright. The result of a man's brain should no more be stolen from him after a stated period of time than his house, his land, or any other of his real or personal property."

Bibliographical.

AN amusing book could be written on the paternity of jests. It would be very interesting to trace anecdotic "chestnuts" to their earliest ascertainable origin. Sir Algernon West, I fear, cannot be a man of very wide reading; had he been so, surely he would have refrained from repeating in his Recollections such an old story as that (Vol. I., page 237) about Saunders and Otley and the indignant subscriber to their library, of which much better versions are in type, or that of Luttrell and Lady Holland, which was recorded by Tom Moore in his Diary. It is notable, by the way, how many of the "good things" now current were first printed by Moore. Sir Algernon represents the late Lord Granville as saying that he had taken the chair at so many gatherings that he ought to be dubbed "Père la Chaise." That reminds me of a story told by Gronow about D'Orsay: "General Ornano, observing a certain nobleman in a bath chair, which he wheeled about, inquired the name of the English peer. D'Orsay answered, 'Père la Chaise.'"

In view of the new Life of Wellington promised to us by Sir Herbert Maxwell, it may be interesting to glance at what may be called the Wellington literature of the last decade or two. In 1888 we had a Life from Mr. Latham Browne. Then, in 1889, came a monograph from the pen of the late George Hooper. This was followed in 1891 by a small memoir by Prof. C. D. Yonge. In 1895 Lord Roberts discoursed to us—first in a magazine and then in book form—about The Rise of Wellington. From Major Arthur Griffiths we received, in 1897, Wellington: his Comrades and Contemporaries; and, in 1898, Wellington and Waterloo. Nor is this all. In the period named there have been new editions of the standard biographies of the Duke by Gleig, Maxwell, and Macfarlane; while to 1889 belongs the publication of the Duke's Letters to Miss J., 1834-51. On the whole, the public has not been badly served in this matter.

Mr. Clement Scott, whose book on The Drama of Yesterday and To-day is issued to-day (Friday) by Messrs. Macmillan, has already published so many of his reminiscences that he can hardly have many more to give us. There was, to begin with, his little work called Thirty Years at the Play and Dramatic Table Talk (1891), then, in the same year, we had his annotations on E. L. Blanchard's Diary. Later he wrote for a weekly paper "a few memories and recollections," republished a year or two ago as The Wheel of Life, of which a second series is promised. Add to these items all the articles of a reminiscent nature which Mr. Scott has contributed from year to year to the Theatre magazine, to the Daily Telegraph, and to various other miscellanies and journals, and it will be seen that the world is already in possession of much data about his connexion with players and with playwrights.

I have more than once in this column protested against the modern mania for "introducing" reprinted classics to the public—for engaging living men of letters to write prefaces, eulogistic or otherwise, to the works of standard authors. No one, probably, has penned more such "introductions" than Mr. Andrew Lang, and I am therefore proportionately glad to find him saying, in the December number of Longman's (with especial reference to the works of Scott and Dickens): "What business had I, what business has anybody, to come, with objections and criticisms, between the author and his public? I hope that readers to whom these great classical novels are new will always read the novel before they read the preface." Mr. Lang goes on to say: "Perhaps the Introduction ought to be purely biographical and bibliographical, an account of the conditions in which the author composed his book." To which I add—Why, certainly.

The new edition of ex-Prof. Masson's Chatterton will be acceptable to many. The book dates from 1875, I fancy, and has, no doubt, been revised for the reprinting, though, in the interval, there has been no further literature about "the marvellous boy." Nine years ago there was a reproduction of Dr. Skeat's edition of the Poems, and that is about all. Talking of Dr. Masson, there is an allusion in the newly-published Journal of the P.R.B. (Pre-Raphaelite Diaries and Letters) to the Miss Orme who became Mrs. Masson and the mother of Miss Rosaline Orme Masson.

Another announced new edition which may fairly be said to be wanted is that of Mr. Le Gallienne's George Meredith: Some Characteristics, not only on account of the critical text, but also for the bibliography by which it is supplemented. The latter—which, as most people know, is by Mr. John Lane—would now bear expansion, being nine years old. Since 1890 Mr. Meredith has given us The Amazing Marriage, Chloe and Other Stories, The Empty Purse and Other Poems, Lord Ormont and His Aminta, One of Our Conquerors, and Selected Poems, besides publishing his essay on Comedy in book form. Then there is the revised edition of his novels to chronicle. Will Miss Hannah Lynch follow on with a new edition of her George Meredith: a Study, which came out shortly after Mr. Le Gallienne's volume?

Another welcome reproduction is that of England's Helicon, promised by Mr. A. H. Bullen as a companion volume to his popular editions of Lyrics, from the Song-Books and from the Dramas of the Elizabethan age.

The announcement of a new book of verse by Mr. C. W. Dalmon reminds me that he is already the author of two such volumes—one, called Minutiae, published in 1892, and another, entitled Song Favours, issued in 1895. It is understood that Mr. Dalmon originally cultivated the Muse in uninspiring circumstances, being, as a point of fact—so I am told—in domestic service. All the more credit to him for what he has achieved in the way of literary work.

The Anglo-French Recollections of Miss M. Betham-Edwards are supplementary, of course, to the Reminiscences which she published in the spring of last year. It seems almost a pity that the former were not embodied in the latter, which were somewhat disappointingly slender in their proportions.

The Latest Bible Dictionary.

Encyclopædia Biblica. Vol. I. (A—D). Edited by the Rev. T. K. Cheyne and J. Sutherland Black. (A. & C. Black. 20s. net.)

THE first volume of this monumental work is, it must be confessed, rather disappointing. The articles of the ordinary encyclopædic character are well and carefully done, and go, at the least, sufficiently far afield. Anyone, for instance, wishing for information about the Ant of the Psalmist can learn, in an article that has taken two Cambridge lecturers to write it, that the ant belongs to the order Hymenoptera and to the family Formicidae, together with such facts about its slave-holding and grain-storing propensities as most people have managed to acquire for themselves. Whether it was worth the while of the editors to devote some two columns to this subject, and nearly the same space to a similar article on the Bee, remains to be seen. It certainly seems that to persons uninformed enough to be in need of such instruction most of the remaining articles in the Encyclopædia, consisting as they do of dry and heavy disquisitions upon the more subtle points of the higher criticism, must not only seem out of place, but positively offensive. If some town-bred Biblical student (most countrymen know quite enough about the subject already) in the course of his researches into the natural history of the ant were to let his eye stray over Canon Cheyne's article on Abraham, would he not be both puzzled and shocked by the remark that "the real existence" of "this supposed hero is as doubtful as that of other heroes"? Nor would he be much reassured by discovering, after wading through many arguments for and against, that Canon Cheyne is of opinion that "not only religiously, but even in a qualified sense, historically also, the narratives of Abraham have a claim on our attention."

To take a more detailed instance, let us look at the article "Creation," upon which Prof. Zimmern (of Leipzig) and Canon Cheyne have laboured in conjunction. Prof. Zimmern first strikes the keynote in the words that it is "an axiom of modern study that the chapters of Creation contained in the Biblical records . . . are permanently valuable only in so far as they express certain religious truths which are still recognised as such. To seek [the italics are ours] for even a kernel of historical fact in such cosmogonies is inconsistent with a scientific point of view." He then gives an account of the cuneiform legends, which he assumes to be earlier in date, and concludes his part of the article by the assertion that "the Israelitish cosmogony must have been borrowed directly or indirectly from the Babylonian." This is a sweeping assertion even from a Professor of Assyriology, and Canon Cheyne comes forward to qualify it, which he does in thirteen columns to his brother professor's three. The result is so typical of the method of this Encyclopædia that it must be given at some length.

Canon Cheyne begins with a table of "parallelisms" between the Babylonian and the Genesis stories seven times greater than that already given by Prof. Zimmern; he follows it up with the so-called "Phœnician" cosmogony of post-Christian writers like Philo Byblius and Damascius, and with one out of the many Egyptian Creation legends. Then he devotes some space to the Iranian (i.e., Zoroastrian) account of the beginning of things, only to suggest that this, too, is derived from the Babylonian, and that "the details of the Jewish Creation story arose independently of Persia," and touches upon the Polynesian myth of the bird-god Tangaloa, which he brings into line by suggesting that in the "mythic original" of the Genesis story the deity was "probably represented" as a bird. This brings him to the conclusion that the Creation story in Genesis i. 1 and ii. 4 "has a considerably mythic substratum," that such substratum is "mainly Babylonian; but Egyptian and even Persian influence is not excluded." He then sets himself to examine why the "Priestly writer," whom he credits with "a purified theology," should have "adopted so much mythology," and gets over the difficulty by the comfortable theory that there was a different version of the Genesis story, also "with strong Babylonian affinities," due to a "second Jehovistic" writer, but used by the Priestly one, which variant has somehow dropped out. He then returns to give an account of other Creation stories to be found in the cuneiform and late Greek texts, which brings him to the conclusion that "we cannot presume that we have recovered the exact form of the Babylonian myth on which the narrative in Genesis i. (or the earlier narrative out of which that in Genesis i. has grown) is based." He next goes into the date at which these "legends" may have been introduced to the Hebrews, and finds that "it is in the highest degree probable" that the Babylonian myths penetrated into Canaan before the fifteenth century B.C., and that as soon as the Israelites became settled in Palestine they would have opportunities enough of absorbing them. Later, we are told that the other periods at which their introduction is historically conceivable are the times of David and Solomon, the eighth and seventh centuries B.C., and the Exilic and post-Exilic periods. There is some further discussion to show that other Creation myths than that preserved in Genesis may have been current among the Hebrews, and then we come to what appears to be the pith of the article. This is the proposition that it was the second Isaiah, "living after the collapse of the ancient State, and amid new scenery and other men," who invented the doctrine of Creation ex nihilo, or, in Canon Cheyne's words, "made the creatorship of Yahwé a fundamental Jewish belief."

Here, then, is a perfectly intelligible proposition, which the present writer, at any rate, has no intention of disputing; but has there ever been, since the death of a late distinguished statesman, a plain statement so buried under a mass of irrelevant detail? That Canon Cheyne is in accord with Prof. Zimmern as to the source of the Genesis story we should have taken for granted from the collaboration of the two. That the Phœnician, Egyptian, and Persian cosmogonies may have influenced the author (or authors) of Genesis is a theory that might have been stated in so many lines with a reference to the passages on which it rests. In any case, it can only go to suggest that some slight qualification of Prof. Zimmern's loan theory is suggestible. The enumeration of the different periods, covering as it does all but a small fraction of the whole known period of Hebrew history at which the borrowing was possible, does look, indeed, as if the author were about to show by the method of exclusion that the borrowing must have taken place at some time convenient for his main proposition. Yet he allows it to rest like Mohammed's coffin suspended in the air, hanging from nothing, and with nothing dependent on it. On the other hand, the proofs that he gives of his proposition that the second Isaiah was really introducing or reviving a novel doctrine in the Creation ex nihilo are exclusively taken from the text of Isaiah himself. And he goes out of his way to suggest that the Priestly writer's "retention of chaos in his cosmogony" was "simply due to educational considerations," or, as he afterwards puts it, was "a concession to popular superstition." Canon Cheyne would, no doubt, consider us uncharitable if we suggested that he is here saying in a periphrastic way that the Priestly writer deliberately wrote for ulterior purposes what he knew to be false.

Such a gloss, however, would hardly be more destructive in its tendency than much of the criticism to be found in this volume. With regard to the Song of Solomon—said by Canon Cheyne to be the remains of a Hebrew marriage song—he says "that the mistake of a Jewish synod cannot be perpetually endorsed by Christian common sense and scholarship"—which means, if it means anything, that it should be cast out of the Canon. The account of the death and burial of Ahaziah in the Second Book of Chronicles is, we are told, on the authority of Mr. Addis (of Manchester College, Oxford), of "no historical value." The description of the wars of Israel against Amalek in Samuel is, according to Prof. Noldeke (of Strasburg), "not trustworthy." The rebuke of Nathan to David is treated by Mr. Addis to be a later simplification, made with a view to edification; while Canon Cheyne thinks it was "imagined by an editor in the interests of reverence and edification," and that "nowhere is the impossibility of upholding the saintliness of this king more apparent than here." Nor does the New Testament fare much better than the Old. The speeches of Paul in Acts, says Prof. Schmiedel (of Zurich), "embody a theology quite different from that of his Epistles. Apart from the 'we' sections, no statement merits immediate acceptance on the mere ground of its presence in the Book." Two of the accounts given in the same Book as to the sin of Ananias, "cannot," says Mr. Addis, "possibly be reconciled." "The Star of Bethlehem," says Prof. von Soden (of Berlin), "shines only in the legend," and both this and the murder of the innocents are treated as "suspicious circumstances" in the narrative of Matthew, from whom, we are told, "we cannot infer more than that Jesus was probably born shortly before or after the death of Herod." One begins to wonder whether such critics consider any part of the Bible trustworthy.

This does not blind us to the fact that there are many excellent articles in the present volume. Such are Mr. Charles's studies of Apocalyptic literature, a subject which he has made peculiarly his own. Such, too, are Mr. King's articles on Assyria and Babylonia, although exception might, perhaps, be taken to a few trifling details which seem erroneous. But the greater part of the book is taken up with criticism of the kind of which we have given example, and we cannot see whom it is intended to benefit. Not the Higher Critics themselves, for they must be supposed to be already in possession of it. Still less the "general reader," for it is dealt out with so faltering a hand that it could only induce in his mind a general distrust of Scripture, without giving him anything in exchange.

Prince and Socialist.

Memoirs of a Revolutionist. By P. Kropotkin. With a Preface by George Brandes. (Smith, Elder & Co. 2 vols. 21s.)

To read Prince Kropotkin's Memoirs is to learn how very far a man may travel in this world. To-day Prince Kropotkin lives in London, intent on all the newest ideals of social life, breathing and purveying the air of liberty and free thought. No need to define Kropotkin, the alert but gentle revolutionist—quiescent now, but foreseeing the battles of to-morrow. On the last page of these Memoirs Kropotkin disabuses his readers of any lurking idea that he regards his life work as over, and is now content merely to write about it. Kropotkin recognises the lull that has fallen on Socialistic agitations since the noisy days of 1886-90; but he sees that a quiet infiltration of Socialist ideals is producing effects more real than those which were born in the clamours and riots of Trafalgar-square. Yet this calm at home and abroad finds Kropotkin, in his fifty-seventh year, "even more deeply convinced than I was twenty-five years ago that a chance combination of accidental circumstances may bring about in Europe a revolution far more important and as widely spread as that of 1848; not in the sense of men fighting between different parties, but in the sense of a deep and rapid social reconstruction." Thus, while most of us forget the fierce war cries of twelve years ago, and toil for the conventional gains and rewards of the moment, Kropotkin stands on his watch-tower, believes that vast shapes will soon vary the horizon, and inhales the mountain air of hope.

All the more striking is it that this man, who was not born when Queen Victoria ascended the throne, can look back to years in Russia when opinions were denied to the rich and liberty to the serf. It is this incredible emergence, within fifty years, from golden chains to liberty, and from an empty principedom to an intellectual, that form the dramatic wealth of Prince Peter Kropotkin's career. Fortunately we have here more than fine materials; we have them in artistic fusion, adorned and recommended by a moderate style and by urbane and wise reflections. To read Kropotkin's life is to ascend to the roof of our age and take in the view on a clear and genial day.

Kropotkin not only comes of a princely family, but was reared in an orchid house of aristocracy—the old sacrosanct Equerries' Quarter at Moscow. His descriptions of his childhood there, and of the life lived by his elders, have a classical simplicity and clearness. He does not spare his rather morose, but completely hide-bound and etiquette-ridden father, whose ambition to see his sons in the army was the ambition of a courtier rather than of a soldier. His own exploits had been less than epical. Sometimes, when his temper was good, he would tell how he won the cross of Saint Anne "for gallantry," and the story is characteristic of much:

The officers of the general staff were lodged in a Turkish village when it took fire. In a moment the houses were enveloped in flames, and in one of them a child had been left behind. Its mother uttered despairing cries. Thereupon Frol, who always accompanied his master, rushed into the flames and saved the child. The chief commander, who saw the act, at once gave father the cross for gallantry.

"But, father," we exclaimed, "it was Frol who saved the child!"

"What of that?" replied he, in the most naïve way. "Was he not my man? It is all the same."

This treatment of a brave serf was perfectly characteristic of Russian life fifty years ago, and it prepares us for descriptions of a more moving kind. Serfs were whipped mercilessly. They were also married by force to women of the same establishment. "Why is it, General, that the number of the souls on your estate increases so slowly? You probably do not look after their marriages," said one landowner to another. On the next Sunday but one there were five marriages on that estate; "the women crying with loud voices, as they are wont to cry during burials." A man servant could be sent by his master to the recruiting board for the slightest fault. This meant twenty-five years' service in the army at a time when even noblemen's sons often received a thousand blows with birch rods in the way of punishment. Common soldiers ran the gauntlet of a thousand men armed with sticks of the thickness of the little finger, and if the victim died under the torture the punishment was completed on his corpse. Nor was the aristocratic life, thus supported and ministered to by serfs, of a noble kind. Nothing could be more petty and sordid than some of the scenes which young Kropotkin witnessed in his father's home. Here is part of a scene where the General is going through his domestic accounts, and servants are trembling all over the house. It shows what serfdom was like under a master who was both more merciful and more moral than many.

He thinks about the hay. Frol is sent to weigh what is left of that, and our stepmother is sent to be present during the weighing, while father calculates how much of it ought to be in the barn. A considerable quantity of hay appears to be missing, and Uliána cannot account for several pounds of such and such provisions. Father's voice becomes more and more menacing; Uliána is trembling; but it is the coachman who now enters the room, and is stormed at by his master. Father springs at him, strikes him, but he keeps repeating, "Your highness must have made a mistake."

Father repeats his calculations, and this time it appears there is more hay in the barn than there ought to be. The shouting continues: he now reproaches the coachman with not having given the horses their daily rations in full; but the coachman calls on all the saints to witness that he gave the animals their due, and Frol invokes the Virgin to confirm the coachman's appeal.

But father will not be appeased. He calls in Makár, the piano-tuner and sub-butler, and reminds him of all his recent sins. He was drunk last week, and must have been drunk yesterday, for he broke half-a-dozen plates. In fact, the breaking of these plates was the real cause of all the disturbance: our stepmother had reported the fact to father in the morning, and that was why Uliána was received with more scolding than was usually the case, why the verification of the hay was undertaken, and why father now continues to shout that this "progeny of Ham" deserve all the punishments on earth.

Of a sudden there is a lull in the storm. My father takes his seat at the table and writes a note. "Take Makár with this note to the police-station, and let a hundred lashes with the birch rod be given to him."

Terror and absolute muteness reign in the house.

Kropotkin père had the joy of seeing his son enter the Corps of Pages. In this privileged corps one hundred and fifty picked sons of the nobility of the court were educated and passed into the army with the highest opportunities of the Czar's favour and promotion. In due time Kropotkin became Sergeant of the Corps, and was in close attendance on Alexander II. One day at a parade of the St. Petersburg garrison an incident occurred which has now a fine dramatic and ironical flavour. Kropotkin observed that somehow the Czar had been left unattended. He therefore resolved to keep close to his royal master:

Whether Alexander II. was in a great hurry that day, or had other reasons to wish that the review should be over as soon as possible, I cannot say, but he dashed in front of the troops, and marched along their rows at such a speed, making such big and rapid steps—he was very tall—that I had the greatest difficulty in following him at my most rapid pace, and in places had almost to run in order to keep close behind him. He hurried as if he ran away from a danger. His excitement communicated itself to me, and every moment I was ready to jump in front of him, regretting only that I had on my ordnance sword and not my own sword, with a Toledo blade, which pierced coppers and was a far better weapon. It was only after he had paused in front of the last battalion that he slackened his pace, and, on entering another hall, looked round, to meet my eyes glittering with the excitement of that mad march. The younger aide-de-camp was running at full speed, two halts behind. I was prepared to get a severe scolding, instead of which Alexander II. said to me, perhaps betraying his own inner thoughts: "You here? Brave boy!" and as he slowly walked away he turned into space that problematic, absent-minded gaze that I had begun often to notice.

And the "brave boy" was Kropotkin, for whom England was soon to be the only shelter! And the Czar was really flying from his assassin, though it took his unknown pursuer twenty years more to accomplish his fateful and fearful errand. On both occasions Irony was present. In the height of his power he is attended by a fervent youth who is destined to become the enemy of his House; but when, twenty years later, he lies in the snow, stricken down by Grinevetsky's bomb, not one of his followers remains by his side; it is the terrorist Emeliánoff who, "with a bomb wrapped in a paper under his arm, and at the risk of being arrested on the spot and hanged, rushes with the cadets to the help of the wounded man."

From the Court Kropotkin passed into the army. But he astonished his comrades by choosing as his regiment the mounted Cossacks of the Amur. The Amur! Siberia! Was the boy mad? Not so. Kropotkin was a student at heart, and if he had possessed the means would have used his little liberty to go into the University. Failing money, he would go to Siberia, and verify the scientific observations of his dear Humboldt. "Besides, I reasoned, there is in Siberia an immense field for the application of the great reforms which have been made or are coming." Thus, even as a loyal soldier of the Czar, Kropotkin was fulfilling his destiny. Nothing is more striking in this wonderful book than the ease, the slowness, the consistency, and the inevitability of the processes and events by which Kropotkin put off the courtier and the soldier to become the scientist and the revolutionist. We are not surprised—we are fully prepared—when, after Kropotkin's return to St. Petersburg, we find him in a cab, vainly trying to induce an officer of the Third Section to answer his questions. The cab followed a significant route

When we went over the Palace Bridge I understood that I was being taken to the fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul. I admired the beautiful river, knowing that I should not see it again. Thick grey clouds were hanging in the west above the Gulf of Finland, while light clouds floated near my head, showing here and there patches of blue sky. Then the carriage turned to the left, entered a dark passage, the gate of the fortress.

"Now I shall have to remain here a couple of years," I remarked to the officer.

Kropotkin's story of his escape from this fortress is one of the best things in the book. Indeed, it ranks as one of the finest pieces of writing of its kind in literature. The interest of most escapes from prison—Latude's for instance—depends on the friendlessness and self-reliance of the prisoner. But here we are thrilled by the courage and self-sacrifice of friends, who organised the whole adventure, and passed signals along miles of streets to the carriage near the prison door, where a staunch Socialist played the final signals on a violin, and another held the last sentry in conversation about—what do you think? About the wonders of the microscope. Nor is the savour of a sublime impudence wanting to the story; for that evening, while detectives scoured St. Petersburg, and the Czar stamped and exclaimed, "He must be found," Kropotkin was dining in public at Donon's. A few days later he saw a steamer in Christiana harbour. "As I went to the steamer I asked myself, with anxiety: 'Under which flag does she sail—Norwegian, German, English?' Then I saw floating above the stern the Union Jack. . . . I greeted that flag from the depth of my heart."

And so Kropotkin came to England and added his fine talents to the evolution of Western thought and civilisation. We wish we could indicate one-tenth of the significance and poignant interest of these Memoirs. And yet poignancy, violence, and martyrdom are not their persistent notes. Not for nothing did Kropotkin search out the principles in the disposition of the mountains of Asia and reveal the harmony of their formation. Not for nothing has he experienced the scientist's joy of generalisation. All the silent peaks of a continent, and their everlasting ravines and infant rivers are pictures in the mind's eye of this revolutionist who has seen serfs scourged with whips, and scorns sharper than whips. It is not Russia now, but the world, he would save. "A revolutionist without emphasis and without emblem," Dr. Brandes calls him in the preface he contributes to these Memoirs. And the phrase registers the calm of a man whose life has been a storm and the centre of storms.

Hazlitt's First Death.

Lamb and Hazlitt. Edited by W. Carew Hazlitt. (Mathews. 4s. 6d. net.)

MR. CAREW HAZLITT'S labours in connexion with Lamb may have been ill-starred (as he admits sadly in The Lambs), but that they are valuable is beyond doubt. The zeal with which he has pursued trails and examined evidence deserves the highest praise; although in a complete Lamb, such as Mr. Carew Hazlitt seems to be preparing, we shall not want everything. By the other camp, at the head of which is, of course, Canon Ainger, Mr. Carew Hazlitt's enthusiasm is held to have carried him already too far; but when we balance against the paltriness of some of Mr. Carew Hazlitt's discoveries the seriousness of such an omission from Canon Ainger's edition of Lamb as "Juke Judkins," we are disposed to withhold our sympathy from either side. We are, however, disposed to consider Canon Ainger's disregard of "Juke Judkins" more deplorable than Mr. Carew Hazlitt's affection for trumpery three-line letters; because Canon Ainger's action is in connexion with a "complete edition," whereas in The Lambs and Lamb and Hazlitt, Mr. Carew Hazlitt simply has collected material towards a complete edition. It is to be hoped that the Canon has given "Juke Judkins" his due in the édition de luxe now in progress.

Mr. Carew Hazlitt's latest batch of Eliana, in Lamb and Hazlitt, is unimportant but interesting—as everything that concerns Lamb is interesting. The nucleus of it is the correspondence relating to a practical joke played upon William Hazlitt by Charles Lamb and his friend Joseph Hume in 1807-8. The humour therein displayed may not be of the highest quality, but it was very well worth preserving. The first document is a letter from Lamb to Hume telling the sad news of Hazlitt's suicide. Lamb begins:

Alas, sir, I cannot be among you. My fate is still not to know on which side my bread is butter'd. I hang between two Engagements perpetually, and the worst always comes first. The Devil always takes care to clap in with a retainer when he sees God about to offer a fee—cold bones of mutton and leather-roasted potatoes at Pimlico at ten must carry it away from a certain Turkey and a contingent plumb-pudding at Montpellier at four (I always spell plumb-pudding with a b, p-l-u-m-b—I think it reads fatter and more suetty).

The story of Hazlitt's death, by cutting his throat with a palette-knife, is then told. Thirteen days pass, in which Hazlitt seems to have meditated upon and enjoyed the canard; and then Hume sends to Lamb Hazlitt's demonstration that he is still a living man. This manifesto, which is the kernel of the present book, is too long to quote entire, but we give an extract here and there:

This petition sheweth that the best way of proving clearly that a man is not dead is by setting forth his manner of life. . . .

Secondly, that every day about twelve or 1 o'clock he has got up, put on his clothes, drank his tea, & eat two plate-fulls of buttered toast, of which he had taken care to have the hard edges pared off as hurtful to the mouth & gums, & that he has then sat for some hours with his eyes stedfastly fixed upon the fire, like a person in a state of deep thought, but doing nothing. . . .

Fifthly, that growing tired of his sedentary posture, he has occasionally got up from his chair & walked across the room (not as an automaton or a dead man pulled with wires might be supposed to do, but with an evident intention to [sic] his manner of rising, & an inequality in his gait, resembling a limp). At one time he turned the front of his great picture to the light, but, finding the subject painful to him, he presently turned it to the wall again. Also, that he has twice attempted to read some of his own works, but has fallen asleep over them. . . .

It should also be especially noted that within the last three weeks he has borrowed money of his friends, which was at all times his constant custom. . . .

These are only a few of Hazlitt's proofs. He then appoints as executor and administrator of his effects Mr. Joseph Hume, "the only person he knows who will not be witty on the occasion," and enumerates these effects:

The said effects & valuables should be principally appropriated to pay his apothecary's & washer-women's bills.

Here follows a schedule of those of the greatest account:

1. A picture of an old woman, painted in strong shadow, nearly invisible. Valued at 5 pounds.
2. Sketch of a large picture of Count Ugolino, the canvass as good as new. Valued at 15s.
3. A nymph and Satyr.—As there is something indecent in the subject, it is suggested that, if a prosecution could be procured against it by the Society for the suppression of vice, it might then be disposed of by raffle to great advantage.
4. Three heads of the father of Dr. Stoddart, in naval uniform, done from description. It is supposed they will do equally well for any other naval officer, deceased, who has left behind him pious relatives. Their value will depend on the fancy of the purchaser. . . .
- 7, & lastly, a small Claude Lorraine mirror, which Mr. Lamb the other evening secretly purloined after a pretended visit of condolence to his sick friend; & which will doubtless be found shamelessly hung up in the chambers of the fraudulent possessor as a final trophy & insult over the memory of the deceased. It is probable that when charged with this irregular transfer of property he will say that it was won at a game at cribbage. But this is an entirely false pretence.

Lamb's comment on Hazlitt's ridiculous temerity in rising from the dead is not quite what the situation seems to have merited; but there is good chaff here:

I for my part always looked upon our dear friend as a man rich rather in the gifts of his mind than in earthly treasures. He had few rents or comings in, that I was ever aware of, small (if any) landed property, and by all that I could witness he subsisted more upon the well-timed contributions of a few chosen friends who knew his worth, than upon any Estate which could properly be called his own. I myself have contributed my part. God knows, I speak not this in reproach. I have never taken, nor indeed did the Deceased offer, any written acknowledgments of the various sums which he has had of me, by which I could make the fact manifest to the legal eye of an Executor or Administrator. He was not a Man to affect these niceties in his transactions with his friends. He would often say, Money was nothing between intimate acquaintances, that Golden Streams had no ebb, that a Purse mouth never regorged, that God loved a cheerful giver but the Devil hated a free taker, that a paid Loan makes angels groan, with many such like sayings: he had always free and generous notions about money. His nearest friends know this best.

A very lengthy letter from Hume, answering each proof of Hazlitt's seriatim, follows, and the thing is over. It is good enough fooling in its way, and Mr. Carew Hazlitt deserves our thanks for giving it so careful a setting.

The rest of the book deals with Lamb and Hazlitt in about equal proportions, and is of value to students of both men.

The Son of His Father.

The River War. By Winston Spencer Churchill. Edited by Colonel F. Rhodes, D.S.O. In 2 vols. (Longmans. 36s.)

THERE is a good deal in Mr. Winston Churchill that reminds one of his father, the late Lord Randolph; but as he is still extremely young, he exaggerates all the qualities and all the defects of that statesman, and reproduces them somewhat out of drawing. He has already seen much and done much—with the Malakand Field Force, up the Nile, and now in Natal—so that, as might have been expected, the book before us bears the impress of a distinct personality. The River War is called by its author "an historical account of the reconquest of the Soudan." It is hardly that; but though it will not live as history, it may win lasting appreciation as a personal contribution to the record of the great deeds which led up to the fall of the Khalifa's power. Mr. Churchill begins at the beginning. He gives us five chapters of the geography, aspect, and history of the Soudan, with an attempt to show its connexion with Egypt and Great Britain. Even nowadays, perhaps, this summary is necessary; and, at any rate, it has its excuse in the fact that it is lucidly and cleverly done, and shows in Mr. Churchill a remarkable faculty for mastering and assimilating a subject.

The military chronicle begins with Chapter VI., and in it is described every incident which exercised an appreciable influence on the course of the campaigns. This part of the book is, in many respects, the best. It is a compilation of the writings of Slatin Pasha, Father Ohrwalder,

Colonel Wingate, General Gordon, Sir Alfred Milner, Count Gleichen, and many other correspondents and compilers of Blue Books; and we are assured that all statements of fact are based upon the written evidence of independent, disinterested eye-witnesses. This part lasts until the end of Chapter XIV., and carries us down to the Battle of the Atbara, and the pause in the operations which then ensued.

With the second volume Mr. Churchill ceases to be compiler from other men's writings, and comes upon the stage in person. When the final concentration for the advance on Khartoum began, Mr. Churchill was attached to the 21st Lancers, on condition that he paid his own expenses to and from Egypt, and, in addition, he acted as the correspondent of a morning paper. He therefore speaks of things at first hand; and as he took part in the famous charge of the Lancers, he missed no opportunity of being in the thick of the "fun." His writing is spirited, but unequal, and the following extract will give a good idea of his style at its best. It describes the charge of the 21st Lancers:

Two hundred and fifty yards away the dark blue men were firing madly in a thin film of light blue smoke. Their bullets struck the hard gravel into the air, and the troopers, to shield their faces from the stinging dust, bowed their helmets forward like the Cuirassiers at Waterloo. The pace was fast and the distance short. Yet, before it was half covered, the whole aspect of the affair changed. A deep crease in the ground—a dry watercourse, a khôr—appeared where all had seemed smooth, level plain; and from it there sprang, with the suddenness of a pantomime effect and a high-pitched yell, a dense white mass of men nearly as long as our front and about twelve deep. A score of horsemen, and a dozen bright flags, rose as if by magic from the earth. Eager warriors sprang forward to anticipate the shock. The rest stood firm to meet it. The Lancers acknowledged the apparitions only by an increase of pace. Each man wanted sufficient momentum to drive through such a solid line. The flank troops, seeing that they overlapped, curved inwards like the horns of a moon. But the whole event was a matter of seconds. The riflemen, firing bravely to the last, were swept head over heels into the khôr, and jumping down with them, at full gallop and in the closest order, the British squadrons struck the fierce brigade with one loud furious shout. The confusion was prodigious. Nearly thirty Lancers, men and horses, and at least two hundred Arabs, were overthrown. The shock was stunning to both sides, and for perhaps ten wonderful seconds no man heeded his enemy. Terrified horses wedged in the crowd; bruised and shaken men, sprawling in heaps, struggled dazed and stupid to their feet, panted, and looked about them. Several fallen Lancers had even time to remount. Meanwhile the impetus of the cavalry carried them on. As a rider tears through a bullfinch, the officers forced their way through the press; and as an iron rake might be drawn through a heap of shingle, so the regiment followed. They shattered the Dervish array, and, their pace reduced to a walk, scrambled out of the khôr on the further side, leaving a score of troopers behind them, and dragging on with the charge more than a thousand Arabs. Then, and not till then, the killing began; and thereafter each man had the world along his lance, under his guard, or through the back-sight of his pistol; and each had his own strange tale to tell.

This gives an idea of Mr. Churchill at his best and most picturesque. It has the great merits of describing action and containing no criticism. In fact, the criticisms are the weak point of the book. Mr. Churchill does not love the Sirdar, but he appears to hold him in wholesome awe. Seldom is a chance missed of saying something sneering about Lord Kitchener, sometimes with grotesque effect, as, for example, where he says that at a critical point in the Battle of Omdurman "Sir Herbert Kitchener began to throw his brigades about as if they were companies. I discern no wonderful skill in the manœuvres, but they were certainly those of a man entirely unmoved either by the emergency or the scale of the event." Lord Kitchener has to undergo a running fire of criticism all through the book, but no one is spared. Nothing is sacred to the young lieutenant, and he is evidently willing to teach the generals and their staff their business. Egotism and "cocksureness" disfigure whole pages of this book, and it is with a positive feeling of relief that we find that Mr. Churchill is considerate enough to quote Napoleon's dicta with approval. But the book is the work of what the Americans call a "live" man, and when he is old enough to smile at these youthful criticisms on men who were training for The River War when he was in petticoats, great things may be expected of Mr. Winston Churchill.

Thackeray at His Worst.

The Hitherto Unidentified Contributions of W. M. Thackeray to "Punch." Edited by M. H. Spielmann. (Harper. 6s.)

MR. SPIELMANN'S justification for this invincibly dreary book is the hypothesis, ingeniously set forth in the Introduction, that an author is "most himself—that is to say, most honest and least self-conscious—in his anonymous writings." This being so, and everyone being interested in the true Thackeray, these odds and ends of his comic journalism have been rescued from the oblivion in which their author left them and are here offered to the students of the Great Cynic. But the fact that the hypothesis has not been fairly stated vitiates the whole scheme. It may be true that an author is most natural and candid when he is writing anonymously—provided he is writing to please himself, and writing without restriction. But it is certainly not true when he is writing for a paper of very decided character of which he himself is not the editor. Why Thackeray, the journalist, carrying out Punch's instructions, or at least cutting his cloth to suit Mr. Punch's proportions and deformity, should be more the real Thackeray than the novelist signing his name to Pendennis we cannot begin to understand. On the other hand, it is perfectly easy to see why Mr. Spielmann felt obliged to erect some such argument behind which to shelter.

For the truth is, this is a deplorable book. Whatever Thackeray wrote in Punch that was worth preserving is to be found in his works. The residuum is mere journalism and not very good at that. Moreover, the self-righteousness that runs through all can and does become very wearisome. Of the high-spirited, incomparable Thackeray of "The Battle of Limerick" and "The Pimlico Pavilion" there is hardly a trace, nor of the hand that wrote "Coddingsby" and the Book of Snobs, and the other good things collected in the complete edition under the title Papers from "Punch." Thackeray at his poorest is all that Mr. Spielmann has to offer; or, at least, so we suppose, for on many occasions, by summarising or merely describing an article, he deprives us of the power of judging for ourselves.

We quote two passages. This is Thackeray at his worst and most hurried, Thackeray falling into the error (which is continually menacing professional comic writers) of mistaking a convention of humour for humour itself. At the time of writing, the clock of Marylebone Church was behaving very erratically. Hence:

THE CLOCKS AGAIN.

[We are authorised to publish the following Extract of a Letter from a Young Gentleman who lives in the New Road, opposite Marylebone Church.]

"16th May, 1844.

"Great heavens! how long is the clock influenza to continue? Invited to dine yesterday with Lady Mary Scramjaw, at half-past seven, in H-rl-y-street. I entered that street, via New-road, precisely as the Clock of M-ryl-b-ue Church indicated the hour to be twenty-five minutes to eight. Two minutes afterwards I knocked at Lady Mary's door—'twas opened, not by the page, that youth attired in green all over yellow buttons like the cowslip meadows in May—not by her footman, a large man with scarlet whiskers and powder—not by her butler, a person whom I have frequently known to be mistaken for a dean;—but by a maidservant—a person in curl-papers and red elbows, who stared at me from either side of her smutty nose as she bade me ascend to the salon.

"I did so, unannounced; and what was my astonishment on entering the drawing room, to find a female in a camisole with no front of hair, standing on the centre table and picking out the bits of wax-candle from the chandelier that hangs in the middle of the room!

"Heavens! how she screamed as she saw me. It was Lady Mary Scramjaw herself!!

"When her fainting form was carried out of the room by the footman (who had his hair in papers) and the butler (without his coat), I found, on glancing at the ormolu clock on the mantelpiece, that it was only Six o'Clock. I had come too early. I had been misled by the Marylebone impostor. Is this not too bad—too gross? What are we to trust, if even Church Clocks deceive us?

"Adieu—Your distracted, but affectionate

"FREDERIC DE MONTMORENCY.

"P.S.—Saturday. I shall never be asked by Lady Mary again. The clock is still at 35 minutes past 7 (hang it!)."

What a thing to reprint! but Mr. Spielmann calls it "characteristic." Much better is the sonnick, by Jeames, of Buckley-square, suggested by Prince Halbert gratuitously killing the Staggs at Sacks-Cobug-Gothey:

Some forty Ed of sleek and hantlered dear
In Coburg (where such hanimmles abound)
Were shot, as by the nusepapers I hear,
By Halbert Usband of the Brititish Crownd.
Britannia's Queen let fall the purly tear;
Seeing them butcherd in their silvin prisms;
Igspecially, when the keepers, standing round,
Came up and cut their pretty hinnocent whizns.

Suppose, instead of this pore Germing sport,
This Saxu wenison which he shoots and baggs,
Our Prins should take a turn in Capel Court
And make a massyker of English Staggs.
Pore Staggs of Hengland! were the Untsman at you,
What avoc he would make and what a trimengus battu!

The rest of the volume is given to the regular work of the member of a comic paper staff. There is political satire, much concerned with Brougham, literary satire, levelled largely at Bulwer, a very poor parody of Wordsworth, a plea for Sunday opening of galleries, and all kinds of miscellaneous copy. "Copy" is the word—copy of a great author writing more or less to order and never within shouting distance of his best. Not even at the time it was written was it particularly good, but now it is stale and flat and very often meaningless. As a book for people who want to read, this was certainly not worth publishing. As a contribution to inferior Thackerayana it is worthy, but dismal. And even then, as we have shown, it is incomplete.

SIMPLIFICATION is the key-word to the Reformation, as it is to every other revolution with a moral core. The vast fabric of belief, practice, and worship which the hosts of popes, doctors, schoolmen, founders of orders, the saints and sages in all their classes and degrees, had with strong brains and devout hearts built up in the life and imagination of so many centuries, was brought back to the ideal of a single simplified relation—God, the Bible, the conscience of the individual man, and nothing more nor beyond.—From Mr. John Morley's Essay on Cromwell in the "Century."

Economical Nonsense-Verse.

A Moral Alphabet. By H. B. and B. T. B. (Arnold. 3s. 6d.)

A Child's Primer of Natural History. By Oliver Herford. (Lane. 6s.)

BETWEEN the nonsense-verse of Edward Lear and Lewis Carroll and that of the most acceptable practitioners of the art at the present moment a wide gulf is set. It is the gulf between creativeness and criticism. In Edward Lear we find high spirits and a rich flow of irresponsible fun. His exquisite rubbish poured from him. In Lewis Carroll is more attention to form and not quite so much rollick, but his springs of fun are inexhaustible. Perhaps for Edward Lear nonsense is the word, and for Lewis Carroll absurdity; but both have the wish to make children laugh and both have the rare gift of abundance.

Comparing these twain with H. B. and Mr. Oliver Herford—two representative so-called nonsense versifiers to-day—we find that the new note is restraint. Abundance is no more, rollick is no more; the wish to please children is no more. The new nonsense-verse is economical and self-conscious. The points are carefully led up to; the whole affair is well calculated, well groomed. (It is the same, of course, in other departments of literature: abundance is to seek there too. In fiction, for example, we miss it. We have copiousness, it is true, but not the abundance which distinguished Dickens and Thackeray. But this is no place to enlarge on such a large subject.)

Of the two writers whose names are at the head of this article H. B. is the cleverer. His technical skill is very considerable, reminding one continually of classical models studied humorously; and he has the comic-satirical-critical quickness for oddities and inconsistencies. An ordinary man sees an elephant, and it is nothing more: H. B. notes how LARGE a trunk it has before, how small a tail behind. The Moral Alphabet is H. B.'s fourth annual volume, and the strain is beginning to tell a little. The first of the four, The Bad Child's Book of Beasts, was the best. More Beasts was an attempt to repeat a success. The Modern Traveller would have been better had the author let himself go. The Moral Alphabet has very agreeable things; but, taken as a whole, it is a little heavy. For children, of course, it will have no attraction; but probably it was never intended to have. We quote two passages. This is A:

A stands for Archibald, who told no lies,
And got this lovely volume for a prize.
The Upper School had combed and oiled their hair,
And all the Parents of the Boys were there
In words that ring like thunder through the Hall,
Draw tears from some and loud applause from all,
The Pedagogue, with Pardonable Joy,
Bestows the Gift upon the Radiant Boy:
"Accept the Noblest Work produced as yet"
(Says he) "upon the English Alphabet;
Next term I shall examine you, to find
If you have read it thoroughly. So mind!"
And while the Boys and Parents cheered so loud,
That out of doors a large and anxious crowd
Had gathered and was blocking up the street,
The admirable child resumed his seat.

MORAL.

Learn from this justly irritating Youth
To brush your Hair and Teeth and tell the Truth.

And this is N:

N stands for Ned, Maria's younger brother,
Who, walking one way, chose to gaze the other.
In Blandford-square—a crowded part of town—
Two People on a tandem knocked him down;
Whereat a Motor Car, with warning shout,
Ran right on top and turned him inside out:
The damages that he obtained from these Maintained him all his life in cultured ease.

MORAL.

The law protects you. Go your gentle way;
The Other Man has always got to Pay.

The pictures by B. T. B. are still very droll, and very much cleverer than at first they seem to be.

Mr. Oliver Herford has little of H. B.'s metrical skill, but he has more genuine fun. That is to say, he is not wholly a critical mind, although it is more critical than not. He has comic ideas, which are sometimes mischievously fresh, as when he gives us a thumbnail group of Eve, a mongoose, and a dead serpent. But here again children's pleasure is not really the objective of the author's ingenuity. We quote three of the best of Mr. Herford's rhymes:

AN OSTRICH.

This is an Os-trich. See him stand:
His head is bur-ied in the sand.
It is not that he seeks for food,
Nor is he shy, nor is he rude;
But he is sen-si-tive, and shrinks
And hides his head when-e'er he thinks
How, on the Gains-bor-ough hat some day
Of some fine la-dy at the play,
His fea-thers may ob-struct the view
Of all the stage from me or you.

A PENGUIN.

The Pen-guin sits up-on the shore,
And loves the lit-tle fish to bore;
He has one en-er-vat-ing joke
That would a very Saint pro-voke:
"The Pen-guin's might-i-er than the Sword-fish,"
He tells this dai-ly to the bored fish,
Un-til they are so weak, they float
With-out re-sis-tance down his throat.

THE CHIMPANZEE.

Chil-dren, be-hold the Chim-pan-zee,
He sits on the an-ces-tral tree
From which we sprang in a-ges gone.
I'm glad we sprang; had we held on,
We might, for aught that I can say,
Be hor-rid Chim-pan-zees to-day.

"I'm glad we sprang" is another of the unexpected turns which make us grateful for Mr. Herford's humour; but he must cultivate the art of blotting; some of the verses in this book are very thin and strained. His drawings, too, are often unworthy of him.

Put concisely, the difference between the fathers of nonsense-verse and H. B. and Mr. Herford is the difference between making fun and making fun of; or, in other words, the difference between creativeness and quizzing. H. B. and Mr. Herford are quizzes.

A Library for Busy People.

International Library of Famous Literature. 20 Volumes.
(The Standard Office.)

UNDER the title "A Great Undertaking" we gave some account, in our issue for October 7, of the International Library of Famous Literature, published by the Standard newspaper. Since then we have had an opportunity of looking more closely into these twenty well-bound, well-printed volumes, and particularly at the excellent Index that fills seventy packed pages of the last volume. The work is a remarkable example of judicious and enterprising publishing. The extracts, many of which run to twelve and more pages, are well chosen, useful biographical notes are appended to each selection, and the various portraits and pictures add to the interest of the work. For those who have not time for much reading, which means the bulk of the population, these volumes make an excellent basis for a small library. They include something of everything, and something for everybody in all departments of intellectual effort from the earliest times to the present day. The editor-in-chief is Dr. Garnett, and each volume is prefaced by an introduction, dealing with a particular branch of literature by such writers as Dr. Edward Dowden, Mr. Henry James, Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. Edmund Gosse, Sir Walter Besant, MM. Zola, Ferdinand Brunetière, Paul Bourget, Maurice Maeterlinck, &c., &c.

These volumes are not intended for those who make literature the business or the chief recreation of their lives. They are for that much larger class—three-fourths of the public—to whom books do not call with any great persistence, but who are quite willing, if the road be made smooth, to give their minds a fair opportunity of assimilating the best. It is better to know something of a writer than to know nothing. Busy people can only become acquainted with the literature of the world by means of a compilation such as this. We do not say it is perfect, but we do say that the reader who makes a judicious use of these volumes will obtain, at first hand, a knowledge of the literature of the world which would otherwise be impossible to him. In an hour's honest reading he can become acquainted with the thought, the style, the method of half-a-dozen authors of repute. Let us suppose a non-reading man dumped down in some remote country district, with a week of leisure evenings, and the inclination to know something of living writers. He could make his selection from the following. The extracts in many cases extend to twelve pages:

Tolstoi. Anna Karenina.
 Ibsen. A Doll's House.
 Meredith. Beauchamp's Career.
 Hardy. Under the Greenwood Tree.
 Ruskin. The Queen of the Air.
 Swinburne. Erechtheus.
 Henry James. "The Future of the Novel."
 W. D. Howells. April Hopes.
 Rudyard Kipling. "Recessional."
 J. M. Barrie. A Window in Thrums.
 W. E. Lecky. History of European Morals.
 Leslie Stephen. Horace Walpole.
 Anatole France. The Crime of Sylvestre Bonnard.
 Emile Zola. L'Assommoir.

And so on through the wide range of modern literature, including such various writers as Dr. Jessopp, Maarten Maartens, F. W. H. Myers, Ouida, G. W. Cable, Stephen Crane, Austin Dobson, Lanoe Falconer, and the author of Vice Versa. Of those who are dead—poets, scientists, novelists, travellers—he could pick and choose where he listed. He could read Huxley on The Physical Basis of Life, one of Lowell's Biglow Papers, a chapter from Stevenson's Kidnapped, Darwin on The Descent of Man, Browning's Any Wife to Any Husband, chapters from Lord Beaconsfield's Lothair and Miss Burney's Evelina, some of Horace Walpole's Letters, a selection of Rousseau's Confessions, a long extract from Romola, and so on back, back to the great writers of the past—of the East and of Greece and Rome.

The Index, which contains over 10,000 entries, has been prepared with care. Every author, the subject on which he writes, the title of his story, history, sketch, or poem, the first lines of every poem, every proper name or character, special and individual topics, are all indexed and cross referenced.

The world at large, unfortunately, is quite content to leave the classics alone. But since a slice of bread is better than no bread at all, we can confidently recommend this library of selections. Half an hour a day spent on these volumes will furnish the reader with a very workable knowledge of the literature of the world, foster a taste for reading, and should inspire him to seek the originals from which these interesting samples have been gathered.

Other New Books.

DON QUIXOTE. (SPANISH TEXT.) VOL. II.

EDITED BY J. FITZMAURICE-KELLY.

It was a happy circumstance when the act of a forger compelled Cervantes to break off from his favourite, but unreadable, Trabajos de Persiles y Sigismunda, and to give to the world the genuine second part of the adventures of Don Quixote. Far from being inferior, this is, in some respects, superior to the former part. If there is less broad farce, there is more true comedy and a finer humour. The ladies especially, the kind but laughter-loving Duchess and the witty Altisadora, are more fitting companions for the renowned knight than any in Part I. It is from Part II., rather than from Part I., that painters choose their subjects. The second part has another advantage over the first: we are much more sure of the genuine text. The work has no longer the air of a piecemeal composition, of MSS. lent about to read or to copy, and then hastily gathered up and sent to the printer without due arrangement. In this second part the author evidently knows beforehand how long it is to be and what will be its end. Hence there is much less for the most strenuous editor to effect. He can do little more than take the edition of 1615 as his basis, and mark, without adopting them, the better variants of later editors. Mr. Fitzmaurice-Kelly and his printers have done their work excellently. It is a delight to have these pages open before one. There is one slight blemish. Instead of giving us something new and welcome in Spanish, Mr. Fitzmaurice-Kelly has printed in English, and slightly recast, his Spanish introduction to Part I. and subjoined it to Part II. Thus, the edition is no longer homogeneous, but piebald and bilingual. Notwithstanding, this British edition of Cervantes will, we believe, long remain a favourite one for all who know Spanish and can afford the price. It is an honour equally to British publishing enterprise and to the sound scholarship of its joint editors, Jaime Fitzmaurice-Kelly and Juan Ormsby. (Nutt.)

LITERARY REMINISCENCES.

BY MRS. ABEL RAM.

M. Edouard Grenier's name is not familiar in England. M. Grenier belongs to a past age, the age of Lamartine, Heine, and George Sand. He is now eighty years of age, but he still throws off a sonnet and spends a cheerful hour with literary friends. Anon he leaves Paris (Mrs. Ram tells us) to escape its turmoil, and muse and ponder and create. Sometimes also to remember. These, his memories, play round such figures as Lamartine, Heine, George Sand, Musset, Sainte-Beuve, Ponsard, and Augier. On the whole they are kindly memories, but they have an honest acidity too. The book is supplemental, in effect, but, of course, not in intention, to the journals of the Goncourts and of Maxime du Camp. Its backward reach into time is magnificent, for M. Grenier saw Chateaubriand and cheered him on the Pont-Neuf; he encountered Béranger in the Louvre; and he hob-and-nobbed with Heine many times in the first years of the Queen's reign. His account of his first sight of Heine is amusing. The meeting occurred in a little news-room whither Grenier went to see the German newspapers:

One day I was sitting at the green-baize table strewn with papers, between two readers whom at first I did not look at. At last one of them aroused my attention by an incessant cough, which was almost as irritating to his neighbours as to himself. My other neighbour presently grew impatient, and, during a fit of coughing more prolonged than usual, gave utterance to a loud "Sh——!" Another fit soon came on, followed by a still more imperative "Sh——!" The unfortunate sufferer turned to my neighbour and asked sharply whether the "Hush!" was meant for him? The latter, thus taken to task, lowering the newspaper which he was holding close to his eyes as though he was short-sighted, gave his interrogator a look of amazement which, whether real or feigned, was comical in the extreme, and answered in a tone of the utmost surprise: "Oh! Monsieur. I thought it was a dog!" I burst out laughing and turned with curiosity to the author of this astonishing repartee. He was a man of about forty, rather stout, and of middle height. He wore no beard and had long fair hair, a high forehead, half-closed eyes which kept perpetually blinking, especially when he was reading. There was nothing about him of the poet or the artist, much less of the man of the world. In fact, he looked like a good northern bourgeois, with a slight German accent. It was Heinrich Heine!

M. Grenier had but one meeting with Hugo. He called on him to solicit his vote for the Academy. Hugo refused it, but Grenier seems to have held his own in the interview. A pleasant, truthful book. But why does M. Grenier pride himself (in his introductory chapter) on his resolve to "avoid Boswellism" in his descriptions, and confine himself to the "personal intercourse" he had with his friends? This is beyond us. (Black.)

PICTORIAL PICKWICKIANA.

EDITED BY JOSEPH GREGO.

These volumes consist mainly of pictures, and designs for pictures, made by the various artists who illustrated the Pickwick Papers. The collection is very large, and it is soldered together by a number of explanatory papers. But pictures and papers are alike for the Dickens scholar. Mr. Joseph Grego is rather a successful collector than a successful editor. His style is early Victorian. Mr. Grego thus fearfully and wonderfully explains his purpose:

In a deferential spirit it is suggested that the execution of this project—in collecting together so much that might otherwise have escaped being brought to a focus, or incorporated in an accessible form—is neither utterly worthless in the eyes of the public at large, nor devoid of popular interest, if the ever-potent attractions of CHARLES DICKENS have solid significance, and the enduring humorous qualities which made PICKWICK "the book of the time" continue popular factors in the present generation.

We leave this book to its predestined readers, whose existence we do not deny, and whose literary appetites fill us with awe. (Chapman & Hall.)

HEROES OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

BY G. BARNETT SMITH.

Of the making of books like these two portly volumes there is no end. In the one volume we have Wellington, Garibaldi, Grant, and Gordon, with portraits and illustrations. In the other volume we have Nelson, Napier, Roberts, and Livingstone, with portraits and illustrations. To neither volume is there a preface. None is needed, for the raison d'être of these volumes is as plain as the approach of Christmas. (Pearson Ltd.)

SAUNTERINGS IN BOOKLAND.

EDITED BY J. SHAYLOR.

Mr. Shaylor is an indefatigable and discerning collector of the praise of books. Here, as in his Pleasures of Literature, he brings together in small compass and tasteful form the testimonies given by a number of great men to the value of reading. Indeed, we like this book better than its predecessor, which was of a more "snippetty" order. Here we have complete writings, and it is good to have a sheaf of essays so famous and illuminating as De Quincey's answer to the question, "What is Literature?"; Sainte-Beuve's answer to the question, "What is a Classic?"; and the essay on "Success in Literature a Test of Merit," by G. H. Lewes; Hazlitt's "On Reading Old Books"; a paper by the late Mr. James Payn, on "The Blessedness of Books"; "The Philosophy of Limited Editions," by Mr. Richard Le Gallienne. Every young book-lover should put this little volume on his shelves. (Wells Gardner. 3s. 6d.)

Fiction.

Some Experiences of an Irish R.M. By E. C. Somerville and Martin Ross. (Longmans. 6s.)

The Real Charlotte and The Silver Fox have excited an inexhaustible appetite for more Irish stories by the same authors. Some Experiences of an Irish R.M., a series of episodes linked together by a faint thread of plot, is, if possible, even better written and more pressed down and running over with humour than either of its predecessors.

The book was originally published chapter by chapter in the Badminton Magazine, and it has a breezy out-of-door atmosphere about it, much of the action passing, as it were, on horseback and after the fox. Major Yeates, who tells the story, is resident magistrate at Skebawn, a small village in the county Cork. But the real hero is Flurry (Mr. Florence McCarthy Knox), the local M.F.H., who "looked like a stable-boy among gentlemen, and a gentleman among stable-boys." Flurry will sell you a horse at any hour of the day or night, and his fertility and resource in conceiving and executing a lark, especially a lark on the shady side of the law, are unparalleled. Equally delightful is his grandmother, old Mrs. Knox, of Aussotias—"eighty-three if she's a day, and as sound on her legs as a three-year old." Her habitual wearing is a purple velvet bonnet and diamonds, and dinner at her house is heterogeneous.

She talked with confounding culture of the books that rose all round her to the ceiling; her evening-dress was accomplished by means of an additional white shawl, rather dirtier than its congeners; as I took her in to dinner she quoted Virgil to me, and in the same breath screeched an oburgation at a being whose matted head rose suddenly into view from behind an ancient Chinese screen, as I have seen the head of a Zulu woman peer over a bush.

Dinner was as incongruous as everything else. Detestable soup in a splendid old silver tureen that was nearly as dark in hue as Robinson Crusoe's thumb; a perfect salmon, perfectly cooked, on a chipped kitchen dish; such cut glass as is not easy to find nowadays; sherry that, as Flurry subsequently remarked, would burn the shell off an egg; and a bottle of port, draped in immemorial cobwebs, wan with age, and probably priceless.

The cheerful and high-spirited squalor of Irish country life gives its character to the book. Poverty and gentility go hand in hand, and accept dirt and dilapidation as a matter of course. Your Irishman is as chivalrous as he can be to women, but he gets drunk at a dance. Yet the brilliant Celtic imagination rises superior to the most distressing conditions; and the Celtic readiness and presence of mind in the most ticklish moments fairly paralyses the slower witted Saxon. Philippa Yeates was a Saxon, and the account of her struggles with her entirely amusing and quite incapable Celtic domestics is highly entertaining.

She regarded Shorelane and its floundering, floundering ménage of incapables in the light of a gigantic picnic in a foreign land; she held long conversations daily with Mrs. Cadogan, in order, as she informed me, to acquire the language; without any ulterior domestic intention she engaged kitchenmaids because of the beauty of their eyes, and housemaids because they had such delightfully picturesque old mothers, and she declined to correct the phraseology of the parlourinsaid whose painful habit it was to whisper: "Do ye choose cherry or clarry?" when proffering the wine. Fast-days, perhaps, afforded my wife her first insight into the sterner realities of Irish housekeeping. Phillips had what are known as High Church proclivities, and took the matter seriously.

"I don't know how we are to manage for the servants' dinner to-morrow, Sinclair," she said, coming into my office one Thursday morning. "Julia said she 'promised God this long time that she wouldn't eat an egg on a fast-day,' and the kitchenmaid says she won't eat herring."

'without they're fried with onions,' and Mrs. Cadogan says she will 'not go to them extremes for servants.'"

After all, sheer unadulterated laughter is one of the best things that even literature can give, and we are hard put to it to remember a book of these latter days to which we owe more of it than we do to the Irish R.M.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

VIA CRUCIS.

BY F. MARION CRAWFORD.

A new story by the author of Dr. Claudius and Sarracinesca is an event in many homes. In Via Crucis Mr. Crawford once again goes to ancient times for his material. "The sun was setting on the fifth day of May, in the year of our Lord's grace eleven hundred and forty-five," is his first sentence. The date and the title together are, perhaps, a sufficient indication that Mr. Crawford's hero is a Crusader. Old England (in the time of Stephen), old France, love, fighting, and piety form the book. (Macmillan. 6s.)

DART VELL.

BY BENJAMIN SWIFT.

A return to the author of The Destroyer's earlier manner. The title is psychological, moves in good society, and touches love and politics. Sir Charles Dartnell is done in the author's best inhuman vein. Having married a beautiful woman, "he presented her with a magnificent black velvet dress, and, when she put it on, she looked so adorable that he said that he wished to hold her thus in his arms all night." (Heinemann. 2s. 6d.)

SHE WALKS IN BEAUTY.

BY KATHARINE TYNAN.

A bright love-story laid chiefly in a quiet Irish village, with pretty landscape touches. "See how rosy the peak is, but the woods are purple at the base. If we were over there where the road winds round the hill-foot, we should hear nothing but the singing of little streams. They are chattering through the bracken everywhere, and spilling into the road, where they make little channels for themselves, clear as amber." (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

THE KING'S DEPUTY.

BY H. G. HINKSON.

A romance of Dublin life in the last century, revolving round the court of the Viceroy. Duelling, social and political intrigue, and a first-class murder trial are among the ingredients of this spirited story, which is told in the first person. (Lawrence & Bullen. 6s.)

ONE YEAR.

BY DOROTHEA GERARD.

A romance of Polish life, by the author of The Impediment. The heroine, a governess, receives at the registry office a slip, bearing an address in East Galicia, whither she goes to enter a Polish family. The governess's "year" is sufficiently eventful to seem quite unreal in retrospect. A moving story. (Blackwood. 6s.)

A VOYAGE AT ANCHOR.

BY W. CLARK RUSSELL.

"'What is your idea?' my wife asked. 'To accept my friend's loan of his ship, the Calenture, for a couple of months; to furnish her cabins comfortably, and to anchor her off the prettiest and safest piece of scenery that our coasts have to offer.'" The Calenture was an old sailing ship of the East India trade, and the anchorage chosen was a spot off the South Downs, near Sandwich. This is the story of the holiday, which proved adventurous. (F. V. White & Co. 6s.)

SIR PATRICK, THE PUDDOCK.

BY L. B. WALFORD.

A well-conceived story showing how Sir Patrick, the Puddock, a simple-hearted, modest baronet in the Hebrides, won the heart of an heiress and prevailed over all her pushful London admirers. (Pearsons. 6s.)

A DESPERATE CHARACTER.

BY IVAN TURGENEV.

The penultimate volume in Mrs. Garnett's translation of Turgenev. The stories are six in number, covering thirty-four years of their author's life. Mr. Edward Garnett contributes a critical Introduction, and the volume is dedicated to Mr. Joseph Conrad, "whose art in essence often recalls the art and essence of Turgenev." (Heinemann. 3s. 6d.)

WHEN GEORGE III. WAS KING.

BY AMYOT SAGON.

Smuggling and murder in Cornwall. The sea is always near. "'Amen,' murmurs the old lawyer," at the end, "and the thunder of the surf upon the rocks echoed back the old man's prayer." A good story of love and adventure. (Sands & Co. 6s.)

THE RED-HEADED MAN.

BY FERGUS HUME.

A conventional detective story, turning on the murder of a banker in Drury-lane, a Peruvian secret society, and a Blue Mummy. (Digby, Long & Co. 6s.)

THE QUEEN OF THE WORLD.

BY LUKE NETTERVILLE.

The hero is projected forward in time to the year 2179 A.D., when he finds the world groaning under a Chinese tyranny after a great Anglo-Chinese conflict, in which the Chinese had used marvellous air-ships and had been victorious. The action passes in South America. (Lawrence & Bullen. 6s.)

JOCelyn ERROLL.

BY CURTIS YORKE.

"Curtis Yorke" is a popular family novelist; and here we have a love-story spiced with just as much agnosticism and wickedness as her readers desire, the whole being "moralised" with correctness and fervour. There is much writing of this kind: "'I live in this street. And you—do you live here?' 'I have rooms at No. 89,' he answered. 'And I live at No. 90,' she said, looking faintly pleased. 'So, you see, we are opposite neighbours.' . . . 'Good-bye,' he said, lifting his hat. 'Good-bye,' she returned. 'And again, thank you so much.' 'Oh, that was nothing,' he said smiling. He crossed the street, and their latch-keys rattled simultaneously." (Jarrold. 6s.)

WISE IN HIS GENERATION.

BY PHILIP DAVENANT.

"If you see a man happy, as the the world goes—contented with himself and contented with what is around him—such a man may be, and probably is, decent and respectable; but the highest is not in him, and the highest will not come out of him." The hero of the story, a young solicitor, is a man of the above type, and his wisdom and his love affairs are carefully studied. (John Long. 6s.)

A TREBLE SOLOIST.

BY HARLEY RODNEY.

The interest of this novel, if it exists, is musical; but there is no surer sign of mediocrity than extravagant names like Dr. Theophilus Thumper, Mr. Cornet-à-Piston, Mr. Alexander Spanker, Mrs. Basher, Mr. Con Moto, and Lady Sugartongs. (Digby, Long & Co. 6s.)

VENGEANCE IS MINE.

BY ANDREW BALFOUR.

In this romance, by the author of By Stroke of Sword, we are in Scotland and in France in the Napoleonic age, and the "vengeance" is wrought upon the field of Waterloo. There is fighting by sea as well as by land, and a family feud, and an early type of the American girl. (Methuen. 6s.)

THE FORSAKEN WAY.

BY PHILIP LAFARGUE.

"It was Founder's Day at the Celibatory of the Good Shepherd . . . in one of the most hopelessly derelict quarters of Essex." The time is the end of the twentieth century, and the celibates are young men who are resolved to refrain from marriage owing to defects which they refuse to transmit. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

Dumas in the Caucasus.

The Story of the "New Stories."

LAST week we established the identity between the supposed posthumous romances of Dumas père and La Boule de Neige and Sultanetta, two well-known volumes of his vast repertory. The interest created has encouraged us to pursue our researches somewhat further. As the result we offer to our readers not only some details concerning Marlynsky, the original author of the stories, and his characters, but an account of how the MS. came into Dumas' possession, and we will show him and his Russian amanuensis at work upon it.

Always eager to leave Paris, to which his eternal work bound him, Dumas was one night informed by his friends the Kouchaleffs that five days hence they would take him to St. Petersburg. Dumas, astonished, replied nevertheless that if he went to Russia, than which nothing seemed more improbable, it would not be to see the city of St. Peter only, but to visit Nijini-Novgorod, Kasan, Astrakan, and Sebastopol, and return by the Danube. The Kouchaleffs assured him that, having a seat near Moscow, an estate at Nijini, steppes at Kasan, a fishery on the Caspian Sea, and a country house at Isatcha, nothing could be more convenient, and they gave him two minutes in which to make up his mind. Dumas, who had been a great traveller, reflected that journeying in Russia under such conditions had always been one of his desires, and that if the expedition was a folly it would be one which he should never repent. He accordingly consented within the time prescribed, and five days later the party was en route.

We find Dumas at Nijini, which he reached after visiting St. Petersburg, Finland, Moscow, and descending the Volga. He was dining with General Alexander Mouravief when the door was thrown open, and he was snatched in the embrace of two totally unknown persons. "We are your Alexis and Pauline," they cried to Dumas' speechless surprise. Slowly he remembered. Alexis and Pauline were no other than the hero and heroine of his novel Le Maître d'Armes, written some twenty years before. The material for the novel, which had an enormous success in Russia, had been supplied to Dumas by the Maître d'Armes himself, the famous swordsman Grisier, who had lived for eighteen months in St. Petersburg. Alexis Annenkof had taken part in the Republican conspiracy of 1825 which led so many men, including Marlynsky's brother, to the scaffold. Annenkof was condemned to exile for life in Siberia. There, at the Petrovsky mines, Pauline, although not his wife, obtained leave from the Emperor to join him, and there they found Bestuchef, afterwards known as the novelist Marlynsky, who had taken part in the same conspiracy. Twenty-seven years later the Annenkofs were pardoned. Bestuchef had left long before to re-enter the army as a soldier in the ranks. Thus it happened that it was the hero and heroine of Le Maître d'Armes who, in relating their own adventures, introduced Dumas for the first time to Bestuchef-Marlynsky.

Some few months later, in a Tartar cemetery in the Caucasus, a little monument painted red and green was pointed out to Dumas. "It is the tomb of Sultanetta, the beloved of Ammalat Bey," said his companion. "Who were they?" asked Dumas. Their story, a history well known among the Tartars, was told to him, and on his arrival at Derbend, where Marlynsky had spent a year in the fortress after leaving Siberia, the writer's MS. of Ammalat Bey, found in his room after his death, was given to Dumas. He now learnt the history of Marlynsky's life in all its details, and visiting the tomb of his ill-fated mistress, Oline Nesterzof, he wrote a poem for inscription at its foot.

On the journey from Derbend to Tiflis, Dumas observed his amanuensis, Kalino (an idle young man whom he had taken from the University of St. Petersburg), absorbed in the perusal of a little Russian book. It proved to be Marlynsky's La Neige du Mont Chakh-Dague. As they went Dumas learned the story, as it was intended he should do by the person (Prince Bagratione) who had placed it in the young man's hands. Not content with gathering up every scrap of information concerning the unfortunate novelist, whose history is too long and perhaps too painful to relate here, Dumas decided that he would try to repair in France the ingratitude of Russia towards a man who, it seemed to him, had genius. He was told that during the reign of Nicholas no critic was bold enough to write in favour of the works of one who had been found guilty, as Marlynsky was, of high treason, and as years elapsed he had been much forgotten. It appears, however, that both Ammalat Bey and Moullah Nour (the identical stories translated by Mr. Gordon) were actually published under Marlynsky's name, and that they obtained some success in Russia.

At Tiflis, where he made a stay of six weeks, Dumas set himself to write. His happiest hours were ever those spent with his pen. Work was sweet after months spent in travelling. He had endured many privations, had sometimes gone without the common necessities of life, but what he had most suffered from was his separation from his pen. So he plunged into a sea of ink, and wrote until his travelling stock of paper, his large blue sheets on which he had written uniformly for some twenty years, and which have been celebrated by so many of his biographers, was exhausted. This was terrible to Dumas. Like indifferent spellers who never can write with the pen which one hands to them, Dumas was lost without his blue paper. He ransacked Tiflis in search of sheets resembling his own, but no one there had ever felt the want of large blue MS. paper. He was obliged to content himself with some of a sickly yellowish hue, called by the vendor white. Perhaps Mr. Home Gordon will tell us whether the paper of the famous MS. corresponds with this description. Supplied with materials of a kind, Dumas returned to his table, which he had placed in a window overlooking all Tiflis, the streets of which were filled with a ceaselessly moving throng of Egyptians, Tartars, Kalmucks, Russians, Greeks, Persians, Kabardians, French, Germans, and representatives of many other countries. Never when at work had he looked on a more interesting or beautiful scene. Work, however, entranced him. He wrote oblivious of time and frequently of food, which his friends sent him from a neighbouring shop, placing the dishes on the corner of his table for his consumption between the composition of two chapters. The idle amanuensis caught the fever of industry from the author of Monte Cristo. He, too, became chained to his desk, and day after day sat translating from Marlynsky, from Pushkin, and from Lermontoff. Had Dumas asked him to translate from Chinese he would have done it. In the meantime snow fell in great quantities, and the writers became weather-bound. It was at Tiflis, then, on December 31, 1858, that Dumas added the signature to the last leaf of Ammalat Bey, which Mr. Gordon has reproduced, together with the concluding lines of the story, in facsimile.

How Long Should Copyright Last?

THIS question was asked, and discussed in a tentative way, in the ACADEMY of November 18. The new Copyright Act (still to be passed) proposes to make copyright in every book endure throughout the author's lifetime, and for thirty years afterwards. Is this period—which may cover, in all, seventy, or possibly eighty, years—long enough? In France fifty years are added to the author's lifetime; in Spain and Italy eighty years. In these countries, therefore, copyright may easily extend to one hundred and twenty years or more.

It was pointed out that copyrights often lapse at a point of time when their cessation seems to press hardly on an author's heirs. The heirs of Scott, Dickens, and Thackeray would still be enjoying a harvest of royalties if our copyright law were that of Spain. The heirs of Charles Reade, George Eliot, and Robert Louis Stevenson will soon lose royalties which it is permissible to think they ought to enjoy for many years to come.

From America comes the proposal that copyright should be perpetual; and Sir Walter Besant, writing in the Author, supports this revolutionary idea. The difficulties and objections which beset this proposal are many and obvious, and are not disguised by Sir Walter Besant.

The question still arises, How long—thirty years, fifty years, eighty years, or perpetually—should copyright last? We have ventured to put this question to a few writers whose opinions we value; and below we give the replies we have received.

Mr. HERBERT SPENCER :

In 1877, when a Commission on copyright was sitting, I argued in favour of the duration now proposed—the author's life and thirty years after his death. Certainly I think fifty years after his death would be better, since it would nearly always cover the possible life of his widow. The question of perpetual copyright I have not considered.

Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON :

In my opinion, the proper period for the duration of literary copyright should be seven years from registration.

Dr. F. J. FURNIVALL :

I think copyright is quite long enough now, and that authors ought to be grateful to the public for making their rights last so much longer than those of patentees, who deserve just as much protection as authors. It is only writers' conceit that makes them think themselves so valuable; and nothing should be done to encourage their delusion.

Mr. G. BERNARD SHAW :

The proposal of perpetual copyright is a piece of rapacious impudence. Would it benefit anybody if the heirs of John Bunyan were now wallowing idly in royalties on The Pilgrim's Progress instead of working honestly for their living?

Considering that an inventor who enriches the world is granted patent rights for fourteen years only, it is not clear why an author, who possibly debauches it, should get from thirty to over one hundred years' copyright. The present term is too long, except in a very few special cases, for which extension should be granted on application to the courts. If the descendants of authors want copyrights, they can earn them by writing books.

Mr. W. L. COURTNEY :

I do not think perpetual copyright is desirable—because a book, being a national possession, ought to be made accessible to the nation. Nor can I think it feasible, because an author's descendants will be either lost or drift into other families.

I think copyright should extend for two generations—say sixty years roughly. And I feel that its duration in the hands of any single publisher should be limited, say, to six or ten years.

Mr. RIDER HAGGARD :

I imagine that most people interested would be satisfied with "during the author's lifetime and thirty years." This, in the vast majority of cases, would mean a copyright of at least sixty years, and in many cases of eighty or one hundred—after that—.

Mr. EDWARD CLODD :

The books needing protection under copyright are not so much those whose success is rapid, but those for which, after long years of neglect and slow sale, a demand, with steady and often increasing sale, arises. Take, e.g., Meredith's works, FitzGerald's Omar Khayyâm, &c. Hence I would grant copyright for at least three generations.

Mr. ALFRED NUTT :

That copyright should be perpetual is the counsel of perfection; permanent possession of an artistic product is far more defensible than permanent possession of land, of raw materials of manufacture, or of the manufactured article. But it is a counsel of perfection which lies outside the range of practical politics. At the very least, however, the term of copyright should be extended so as to profit, should the right be a source of profit, the descendants of the holder to the third generation. Many works only become profitable from half a century to a century after the author's death, because then only are they recognised as classics and benefit by a forced sale consequent upon their introduction into the educational curriculum of the country; it is scandalous that the writer should not be able to leave this chance of wealth to his descendants, or should not be able to discount it during his lifetime, which he can only do if the purchaser of his right has the assurance of a lengthened term during which to enjoy it. It now happens that almost the only writer who can sell his copyright to advantage is the one who, from the standpoint of the permanent interests of literature and humanity, deserves the least consideration and protection—viz., the ephemeral novelist.

Mr. ANTHONY HOPE :

In reply to your questions, I think :

That perpetual copyright is not desirable. It would be compatible with the public interests only under the most stringent safeguards, and would not be a good form of hereditary property, as it would entail neither duties nor responsibility.

That the term proposed in the new Bill is satisfactory, and should, for the present at least, be accepted by authors. In the great majority of cases it would give a material increase on the present term, and it covers the time during which a man's immediate descendants are naturally dependent on the results of his labours.

It might be, however, that some slight extension of the term would be found desirable for the sake of making the law of various countries uniform. I have not looked into this point.

Dr. W. ROBERTSON NICOLL :

The idea of perpetual copyright seems quite impracticable, but I feel that an author ought to be able to leave his books as a heritage to his children. I do not think that any author's books should be out of copyright till his last child is dead. It would be easy to adduce instances of the great hardships that have resulted from the absence of any such rule. In my opinion it is not sufficient that copyright should be during an author's lifetime and thirty years. Suppose Charles Dickens had died in the year after he wrote the Pickwick Papers, would it have been just that his children should have failed to reap any benefit from the achievement of their father's genius during half their lives? I cannot imagine that any reasonable person would say so.

It will be seen that every writer we have consulted rules that perpetual copyright is impracticable or undesirable. But there is a strong feeling that the period of copyright contemplated by Lord Monkhouse's Bill, which will be before Parliament next year, is too short. Mr.

W. L. Courtney is in agreement with Sir Walter Besant in his view that a publisher's enjoyment of a copyright should be rigorously shortened in point of time. Our own opinion is that authors' copyright should be given a longer life than is proposed by the Bill, and we shall return to the matter.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

THE lay pontiff of the Reactionary Party has just delivered a very eloquent sermon from the presidential chair of the Academy. I had never heard M. Brunetière speak until then, and I will own at once that I was greatly surprised by his admirable delivery. He read his discourse in such a way that if you did not see the MS. in his hand, and note how regularly he turned over the pages, you would have been convinced he was uttering an extempore oration upon virtue. The great man is himself extremely small and frail and insignificant-looking. His features are of a common mould, in a short, lean, pallid visage; the brow is narrow and low; the mouth, under a slight dark moustache, is wide and thin, with a singular twist upon one side which, in the movements of speech, shortens the profile and effectively deepens the expression. It is a face in repose that means nothing, but which, from its very mobility, responds eloquently to the command of utterance, and to the superficial observer then appears to mean a great deal.

Watching his mediocre exterior with attention, and listening with no less eager attention to the clear and commanding voice that held us all with an almost ecclesiastical imperiousness, I came to understand the secret of M. Brunetière's power and success. There is just the amount of insincerity and dogmatism in the editor of the Revue des Deux Mondes to insure him success with a social party whose attitude towards sincerity is rather that of contempt than of admiration, and which likes to hear the opinions that maintain its prestige expressed with conviction by the outsider it condescends to adopt. There is something about him of a second-rate diplomat and a first-rate Jesuit, a little of the charlatan and a very strong dose of the literary Tartufe. And being a pedant, he clothes the poverty of his style in the massive folds of the mantle of erudition. M. Brunetière, being a sage as well as an erudite, attained glory the day he was advised to discover Bossuet, a genius in exquisite harmony with his own narrow and dogmatic talent. His attitude the day he made this discovery, and resolved to offer Bossuet for the admiration and wonder of the polite world of Paris, was as impressive as that of Columbus exclaiming "Tierra!" when he saw America upon the horizon. Bossuet was to make M. Brunetière, to carry him on a wave of fashionable homage to an armchair among the living Immortals, and ordain him the mouthpiece of fashionable and snobbish patriotism. Years ago he had begun to wage his bitter war against Zola, on the ground of naturalism. Here he was in his right as a literary critic, and his fierce hostility to modern French pornography is to his honour. But when he carried this same hostility into the Nationalist camp, and offered it as a weapon of war to Zola's political enemies, we were able to measure the man's sincerity. Not content to espouse openly a criminal cause, he placed a great, large-minded review (become under his narrow editorship a dull, pedantic, and soporific organ, in which you may expect to find everything except wit, humour, charm, or gaiety) at the service of falsehood, injustice, and calumny, and started a society to enable the ladies and gentlemen of the Faubourg to shout at will "Vive l'Armée!" in the intervals of gathering subscriptions for the noble Henry's widow and plotting to spoil M. Loubet's hat while awaiting the opportunity of relieving him of his head.

And so it comes to-day that M. Brunetière rivals M. Arthur Meyer, the reckless editor of the Royalist organ, Le Gaulois, in guiding aristocratic Paris and interpreting in reactionary style its noble sentiments. He is on the side of clericalism and militarism. In this speech he made a fervent reference to sainted kings. He despises science, and naturally could not lose so fine an occasion to give another of his violent digs at the "intellectuals"—that is, at all the writers, Academicians, thinkers and savants who elected to walk behind M. Zola during the past two years, rather than behind the eminent M. Brunetière. He informed them that they were less necessary to the State than the virtuous humble whose eulogy he was intrusted to utter on behalf of the Academy; and hinted that, perhaps, of all classes they comprised the one which is the least indispensable to the prosperity and happiness of a land. Such a statement, like the honour of the Army, has become too decided a cliché of his party not to shock us by its hollowness. I am of opinion that the virtue, the disinterestedness, the endurance and unconscious nobility of the humble class of society, is of far more infinite value to society to-day and to posterity to-morrow than all the learning and art of men of talent and of men of genius. The illiterate life-boatman who braves the midnight storm to rescue his drowning fellows is for me a far nobler and more useful creature than the man of erudition who sits in his study and discovers the origin of languages, or the poet who reveals the travail of his soul. But I am too well aware that this is M. Brunetière's war-cry to be convinced of its sincerity upon his lips at this hour of the day. If M. Brunetière were so sure of the nothingness of literature, and so enamoured of martial glory that he even discovers it in the Staff Cabinet athwart the dishonour of forgery and perjury, how comes it that he has devoted his manhood to books and pen and ink when he might have been leading his country to another Sedan, or helping General Mercier and the gallant Henry to add to their poor little collection of fifteen forgeries which even did not succeed in proving the guilt of their unfortunate victim? Who knows, if M. Brunetière had elected to wear the kepi he so passionately admires, instead of the humble palm-embroidered coat he so evidently despises, Dreyfus might have been sent back to the Devil's Isle, where certainly M. Brunetière would be delighted to have him again.

And yet, despite its insincerity, it would be impossible to deny the impressiveness of M. Brunetière's sermon at the Academy. He speaks admirably, far better than he writes, thanks to his warm and clear utterance, to his large and restrained gesture, to the mobility of his expression. As a writer he is too much of the professor—heavy, sententious, mediocre, and second-rate. As a speaker his style is brightened by his personality, and becomes more supple—I may not say wittier, but more pointed and suggestive. In fashionable and reactionary circles he is hailed as a second Bourdaloue; but this is the exaggeration of gratitude and admiration. Still, as a preacher he would have proved a force, for he was born to preach. His sermon on the "Prize of Virtue" is a masterpiece of its kind, with just enough irony to please fastidious ears, just enough sentiment to delight the sentimental, just enough false humility to flatter the unintellectual. It was a lesson to hear idle and luxuriously dressed women, unvirtuous males in the best of tailoring, applaud such a statement as this—"The virtues of the humble are the real force which counterweights, and in consequence equilibrates the eternal and increasing press of misfortune, of poverty, and vice." I hope they understood it, but I doubt it. This sounds like unconscious irony on the lips of M. Brunetière: "Remember that the true measure of the value of men—what makes men really great and nations prosperous—is their devotion to the interests of humanity."

The Amateur Critic.

[To this page we invite our readers to contribute criticism, favourable or otherwise, of books new and old, or remarks on striking or curious passages which they may meet with in their reading. No communication, we would point out, must exceed 300 words.]

A Promising Debut.

WILL you allow me—merely as an “Amateur Critic”—to invite your readers’ attention to a new novel by—as I suppose—a new writer? I refer to The Enchanter, by U. L. Silberrad. U. L. Silberrad—whoever he [or she] may be—splits his infinitives and uses “aggravating” when he means “irritating”; also he drags into his story much superfluous and unconvincing melodrama. But, if you separate these errors and superfluities, there remains a really fine story—fresh, original, and strong—with a hero who is worth following, and, in pp. 232-263, moving on the heights of romance. I should be sorry if this story missed its welcome, for if it be a first performance it seems to me a remarkable one, of quite unusual promise.

A. T. QUILLER COUCH.

“The King of the Golden River.”

EVERYONE must be sorry for the mistake about the new Dumas stories, although in making those stories accessible to English readers the book is to be valued irrespective of the genuineness of the discovery. My own debt to The Snow on Shah-Dagh is twofold, for it is not only very entertaining itself, and the Mollah Nour a great thing in robber chiefs, but by reminding me of Mr. Ruskin’s King of the Golden River it gave me the impulse to read that most satisfactory fairy tale once more. The two stories have this in common, that in both of them there is a good youth and a difficult enterprise involving a mountain ascent. In Dumas, Iskander must brave the Mollah Nour and, fetching snow from the summit, convey it safely to the Caspian Sea; in Ruskin, Gluck has to succeed in casting three drops of holy water into the source of the golden river. Few stories can so take the child’s imagination as Mr. Ruskin’s does. It should have the widest circulation.

For an Anthology of Parody.

I SEE that Sir Algernon West, in his Recollections, states that as a child he had Miss Fanshawe for a neighbour, and then, to recall Miss Fanshawe to the reader’s mind, he quotes her famous acrostic on the letter H:

’Twas whispered in Heaven, ’twas muttered in Hell, and so forth. But why is it that Miss Fanshawe is never credited with anything else when her name is mentioned? Her “Fragment in Imitation of Wordsworth” is far more entertaining, and has a quality, to my mind, much superior to the acrostic; which any ingenious person could have written nearly as well. I copy out the Wordsworth parody:

There is a river clear and fair,
’Tis neither broad nor narrow;
It winds a little here and there—
It winds about like any hare;
And then it takes as straight a course
As on the turnpike road a horse,
Or through the air an arrow.

The trees that grow upon the shore
Have grown a hundred years or more;
So long there is no knowing.
Old Daniel Dobson does not know

When first those trees began to grow;
But still they grew, and grew, and grew,
As if they’d nothing else to do,
But ever to be growing.

The impulses of air and sky
Have reared their stately stems so high,
And clothed their boughs with green;
Their leaves the dews of evening quaff,
And when the wind blows loud and keen,
I’ve seen the jolly timbers laugh,
And shake their sides with merry glee—
Wagging their heads in mockery.

Fix’d are their feet in solid earth,
Where winds can never blow;
But visitings of deeper birth
Have reached their roots below.
For they have gained the river’s brink,
And of the living waters drink.

There’s little Will, a five year’s child—
He is my youngest boy;
To look on eyes so fair and wild,
It is a very joy:—
He hath conversed with sun and shower,
And dwelt with every idle flower,
As fresh and gay as them.
He loiters with the briar rose,—
The blue belles are his play-fellows,
That dance upon their slender stem.

And I have said, my little Will,
Why should not he continue still
A thing of nature’s rearing?
A thing beyond the world’s control—
A living vegetable soul,—
No human sorrow fearing.

It were a blessed sight to see
That child become a willow tree,
His brother trees among.
He’d be four times as tall as me,
And live three times as long.

In a footnote to these verses, in The Literary Remains of Catherine Maria Fanshawe, we are told that one lady, a friend and admirer of Wordsworth, on seeing this poem, admired it exceedingly, and wondered how it was that Wordsworth had never read it to her.

Introductions.

THE habit of the reading public, or perhaps one should say its publishers, has of late years grown to such an absurd length of gentility that it is hardly possible to approach any of one’s old favourite authors in a new edition without the tedious ceremony of an introduction. It is true that if a reader doesn’t like introductions he can skip them, but one can’t skip a title-page when it is branded (in the same size type as the author’s) with the name of the introducer. There are, of course, occasions when an introduction is useful; it is always pleasant to read intelligent praise of a great book, but it is too often looked upon as a fit opportunity for the writer of the introduction to show how consumedly clever he or she is, and how much better written the book might have been. I wonder why introductions are sometimes written by persons who are clearly out of sympathy with their subjects. One does not care to see one’s author belittled; on the other hand, one looks for something more than fulsome praise. Books that will not bear a critical examination hardly deserve introductions, but an appreciation which will help the reader to enjoy or benefit by the book before him, should in my opinion, be the chief object of an introduction.

Things Seen.

The Higher Patriotism.

"They had shouted 'Rule Britannia,' they had sung 'God Save the Queen.'"

SOMEBODY had recited the poem from which the above line is quoted. The "little tambourine" had gone round to the accompaniment of a cheerful clink of coin and full-throated cries expressive of entire confidence in the present Government. The young men of the "Literary and Debating Club" were all agreeably stirred to a sense of their own patriotism. Certainly, it had been a most successful meeting; but, once the "Absent-Minded Beggar" had been recited, all felt that the great moment had come and gone; and the last item on the programme, vaguely described as "Poem XXV.," excited but languid interest. The smart young shopmen, who formed the bulk of the club, prepared to listen politely, but coldly, to the stranger who was mounting the improvised platform.

He had a fine voice, this stranger; at his first words, the languid audience leant forward with that common instinct of suddenly aroused interest that runs through a crowd:

What have I done for you,
England, my England?
What is there I would not do,
England, my own?

As the strenuous lines rolled out, the young faces, so flushed and triumphant a moment before, grew grave and somewhat pale. But for the brave voice speaking brave words, the hush was intense—absolute. "Poem XXV." ended—still silence for a full minute! Then applause, rapturous and long, but differing in some subtle, intangible fashion from what had preceded it.

They all trooped out, and I—firmly wedged in the crowd behind two especially resplendent youths, who spent a large part of their day in suggesting wants to undecided women—heard this: "It's all very well to fling one's shilling in a 'at, but that last chap . . . I don't know that I quite liked it—it makes one so jolly discontented; but . . . I wish I could do something for—for . . ."

On the Road.

THERE were very few people living at S—, in Worcester-shire, who ever passed Job White, the roadman, without speaking to him, for he always had time enough to stop working while ordinary greetings were exchanged. One day, however, my conversation with him was more than usually prolonged.

"Good morning, Job. How are you to-day?" I said.

"I'm fair to middlin', myself," he replied, "but my missis 'er says 'er be nation bad. I've sent for the doctor to see 'er, 'er be seemingly that bad."

"What's the matter?" I asked.

"Well, 'er's been queer, sort of like, this several week. Awful tryin' it's been for me along with it. Some mornin's 'er gets up and some mornin's 'er don't, but just lies and groans for all the world like a dumb animal in pain. And some nights 'er's in bed when I go 'ome, and not a bit of vittles to eat nor nothing; and some nights 'er be up and as cheerful as a cricket, so to speak. It's nation tryin', and makes a sight of a mess of me."

"Was she worse this morning?"

"Ah, this mornin' 'er was somethin' tremengus for groanin'; groaned so Bill Saunders's wife next door 'eard, so I up and says: 'The doctor 'ull see you, Ann'—and off I sends for 'im. 'E's gone along some 'our back, and rightly ought to 'ave come back by this time. Seemingly it's a long job."

"He'll make her all right, I hope."

"'E'll give 'er sommut or t'other, tho' their stuff is mostly blarmed rubbish, fitter for a pig than a 'uman bein', when all's said and done. 'Ere 'e comes, to be sure."

The doctor rode down the hill slowly and stopped by us.

"Well, 'ow's the old un now?" Job asked.

"No more pain, Job, she's done with that. Her troubles are over, she died an hour ago."

"Well, I'm blarmed," said Job, dropping his rake on to the road. "And 'ere be I scrapin' mud. Dead, poor old ooman. 'Er was ill after all, then. Lor' bless me, what a cantankerous old fool I've been all these weeks. Dead, did you say? Why, I thought 'er was only lazy. I'll shuffle off 'ome as fast as I know 'ow, and see to things a bit. Poor old ooman, poor old ooman, poor—"

Job's murmurs became inaudible as he slowly mounted the hill to the village.

Memoirs of the Moment.

LIEUTENANT FRANCOIS OWEN LEWIS, who was killed on Friday last week while in charge of the armoured train sent out to reconnoitre at Enslin, was a particularly fine specimen of the young British officer. He joined the Militia after leaving Beaumont School, and in 1890 passed out into the Durham Light Infantry—a regiment in which his grandfather served early in the century. Transferred to the Indian Staff Corps, he had some rather terrible experiences during the Plague time in Poona. The British Government decided that the natives should not die, and Lieutenant Owen Lewis was one of the officers appointed to stamp out the disease by an interference with domestic and religious habits that stirred the natives to indignation. They preferred to die, and why should anybody intervene? The Christian might not have a very strong opposition to the argument which assured him that death was a visitation of God, that submission to such visitation was the mark of a righteous man, and that death meant life in heaven. The refrain of a favourite hymn of the young Lieutenant's—"I do so long to die"—surged in his ears; but it was drowned by the order from Pall Mall. He did his duty, and another "Plain Tale from the Hills" might be written by the one hand framed to write it. Lewis's own death was intended by a people to whom death meant nothing. He and his friend, Lieutenant Ayerst, and Mr. Rand, the Plague Commissioner, had been to a reception at Government House, Poona. In the confusion of departure, Ayerst took Owen Lewis's carriage by mistake. Owen Lewis, who took Ayerst's, owed his life, and very grudgingly owed it, to the error. Both Mr. Rand and Lieutenant Ayerst were killed on the homeward drive, the native bullet intended for Lieutenant Owen Lewis entering the brain of his best friend.

LIEUTENANT OWEN LEWIS was glad enough to leave India and its uncanny tragedies, when he became aide-de-camp to his brother-in-law, Sir Alfred Moloney, Governor of the Windward Islands. There he encountered the great hurricane of last year, and took a large part in the administration of relief. Then news reached him from South Africa, where his younger brother, Mr. C. A. Owen Lewis, had been already appointed by Mr. Rhodes secretary of the South African League. He knew what was in the air; and was found visiting his brother at the Cape and being one of the last to leave Johannesburg for Lorenzo Marques—which he did in a cattle-truck. Of course he offered his services as a soldier, and, of course, they were accepted. Attached to the Loyal North Lancashire Mounted Infantry, he took part, without disaster, in the Battle of Belmont last week, but the next day was killed by a Boer bullet. He himself was a splendid shot, as well as an athlete all round. He married the daughter of the late Sir C. F. Shand, Chief Justice of Mauritius, and leaves a son and a daughter. His father—who survives his adventurous son—sat in Parliament as member for Carlow in days before Home Rule seriously was. He has always had a turn for journalism, contributing to the London daily press a large amount of matter, chiefly in opposition to the National movement in Ireland. The son whom he now mourns had the same facility with his pen, and on one or two occasions acted, while abroad, as special correspondent of the Times.

MR. HENRY VAUGHAN did not wait until his death, which took place in Cumberland-terrace the other day, to present to the nation his unique collection of Michael Angelo drawings. They have already long enriched the British Museum Print Room; while the South Kensington Museum had from his generous hand the studies of Constable—and to part with these cost him the greater pang of the two. The most representative picture of the same British master to be found in the National Gallery, the "Hay Wain," was Mr. Vaughan's gift—a picture which was exhibited in Paris in 1824 (when Henry Vaughan was thirteen), and which, more than almost anything else, took French painting from the Classic to the Romantic. Henry Vaughan (who was no kinsman of the Roman Cardinal or of the Anglican Dean, but was of Quaker connexions) was the son of a rich City man, and, being a bachelor, he was able to devote an easy fortune to the pleasures of collecting. A club man, in its easy sense, he could hardly be called, although he was a frequenter of the Athenæum; nor did his name ever figure on the lists of men prominent in Society or in the semi-social public movements of the day.

THE writer of an interesting notice of Henry Vaughan in a morning paper alludes to the fact that he was at school with Lord Beaconsfield. Unlike most of the mentions of the boyhood of Disraeli this particular one is perfectly accurate. The school was at Walthamstow and was kept by a Dr. Cogan, a Unitarian. Disraeli was then fifteen, and his father's wish had been to send him to Eton. But Eton did not love Jews; and a Jew Benjamin D'Israeli still remained to schoolboys, though his name already appeared upon the baptismal registers at St. Andrew's, Holborn. Disraeli made one of his heroes say, in later life, that "he detested school more than he ever hated the world in the darkest moment of experienced manhood." Henry Vaughan's account of his old class-mate easily made you read the passage autobiographically. Certain it is that the boy, whose cleverness as a storyteller in the dormitory most impressed his fellows, made a very brief stay at Walthamstow; and that he afterwards referred to the place as one where you were taught everything you did not want to know.

NORTH BORNEO is to afford Mr. Hugh Clifford a new field for the observation that has gone to make many a pleasant sketch of life among the Malays. That the British agent at Pahang has been appointed Governor of British North Borneo will shortly be apparent enough to that public in particular which follows his agreeable lines in the pages of Macmillan's Magazine.

THE ribald caricatures of Queen Victoria, over which Paris consents to smile, afford sufficiently damning proof of the continued lack, among a section of Frenchmen, of "that generous loyalty to rank and sex" which Burke has indicted in a passage that still stirs the pulses of Englishmen. But a word may perhaps be permitted here in reprobation also of some of the war pictures now published in our own papers—pictures which profess to portray the slaughter of Boers, fleeing before the foe, and in the act of being transfixed by the bayonet of a grinning Tommy Atkins. No soldier who has himself faced death with fortitude but loathes these indecent presentations. The dying Boer is shown with a beard and hat that would provoke the street's derision. He is made ignominious; it is a figure of fun that is pierced with steel. The ultimate decencies of humanity, yielded on the field by the victor to the vanquished, are denied him in Fleet-street; he is denied the last dignities in death. Such barbarous illustrations are an offence against the instinct of the brute to hide away blood and to give decent burial to the corpse.

The Dumas Romances: The Translator's Statement.

SIR,—Will you allow me to put myself right with the public in reference to the Dumas romances, of which my translation has just been published in London? Following up the suggestions in the current issue of the ACADEMY, I find that these romances have already been published under other titles in Brussels. The titles written on the Dumas MSS. in my possession are "La Neige du Mont Chakh-Dague" and "Ammalat Bey." Under other titles I find these stories were published by M. Calmann-Lévy, in 1862, and translations into English were subsequently issued by Messrs. Dent.

I have only to-day discovered these facts, and wish at once to make them public; though, for myself, I have no responsibility in the matter beyond my commission to translate the romances. The articles I contributed to the Outlook were based on information supplied by Mr. Apostolides, who is not only responsible for the entire publication, but has defrayed all the expenses. Mr. Apostolides is now residing at 42, Brunswick-terrace, Brighton, and he will no doubt be able to throw further light on the matter.

He based his belief that these MSS. were the only unpublished posthumous romances by Dumas upon (1) the source from which he obtained the documents; (2) the statement of their complete authenticity after careful examination by M. Calmann-Lévy, the publisher of all the works of Dumas; (3) the statement by the son-in-law and legal heir of Dumas that it was an unpublished and hitherto unknown work of his relative; (4) the fact that the MS. was all in one handwriting, which was identified by publisher and relative as that of Dumas himself. This last fact disposed of Dumas' own preface ascribing one tale to Marlynsky, who was presumed to be one of the fictitious personages with which both Scott and Dumas delighted to vivify their introductions.

A prefatory note of explanation, signed by me, will be appended to all future copies issued by the publishers of my translation, Messrs. Simpkin & Marshall, who will refund the money expended by anyone who bought the book under erroneous statements.

My own responsibility ceased, as I have said, with the translation, and it has been so kindly received by critics and public that, though it is now on a different basis, I can only express my personal regret that it should have been first presented under any misapprehension, however natural that misapprehension was, seeing the certificates of M. Calmann-Lévy himself and of the representative of the Dumas family.—I am, &c.,

Mr. Henty's Books.

SIR,—We were pained to read in Mr. Henty's letter, which appeared in your issue of the 18th inst., a reaffirmation of the statement (denied by us in a previous letter which appeared in your columns) that we wrote to him asking permission to change the title, and that we did so notwithstanding his letter of protest to us.

We have written to and interviewed Mr. Henty on the matter, and he admits the truth of our statement that we neither wrote a letter to him asking permission to change the title, nor received a letter from him protesting against our doing so.

Our negotiations for the purchase of the copyright, and permission to change the title, were conducted exclusively with Messrs. F. V. White & Co. Thanking you for your courtesy,—We are, &c. S. W. PARTRIDGE & Co.

‘As Idle as a Painted Ship——.’

SIR,—Do not Mr. Bullen in The Log of a Sea Waif and your reviewer, in his notice of it in the ACADEMY for November 18, miss the point of Coleridge's lines? Apart from the misquotation, which your reviewer leaves uncorrected (for Coleridge wrote idle and not silent), it surely is a little hard upon Coleridge to say that his simile is “only a poet's licence.” Does it require much licence to conceive of a ship painted on canvas, on a sea painted upon the same material, as about as idle a thing as this world knows?

And even in the other alternative, that seaman's sensibility must be very tender upon which the lines would grate. I cannot claim such wide experience of the sea as Mr. Bullen can, but mine is certainly sufficient to assure you that a ship on a calm sea, without enough breeze even to cause the drooping sails to flap, is the most aggravatingly idle thing possible. I fancy Coleridge must have been at sea in a dead calm and knew.—I am, &c.,

Studies in Contemporary Style.

SIR,—Your contributor “E. H.,” while engaged in pointing out inaccuracies of expression, has committed the more grievous fault of making erroneous statements.

He says “movement and permanence are contradictions in terms in fact and in thought.” This statement contains two fallacies. (1) Movement and permanence are not contradictions in terms. The opposite of movement is not permanence, but rest; and the opposite of permanent is transitory. (2) They are not contradictory in fact. Everything that we are accustomed to look upon as permanent (such as the earth, sun, stars) is not at rest, but in a constant state of motion. Even to the untutored savage these things had apparent motion, and we now know they have real motion. Then, again, there is molecular motion, which is going on in everything; and in the realm of metaphysics also—mind, soul, spirit, intelligence, all of which are looked upon as permanent—cannot be conceived as otherwise than in movement. In the same way it may be shown that they cannot be contradictions in thought.

Again, “E. H.,” in his rather contemptuous remarks about “illiterate writers and speakers,” commits himself to the rather doubtful statement that “phase can properly be applied to the moon only,” and that in speaking of a subject the word to be used is aspect.

Will “E. H.” kindly give his authority for this statement about phase? It is new to me, and phase is used in physics quite apart from the moon. Perhaps he will also kindly enlighten us as to the difference in meaning—i.e., real meaning—between phase and aspect, except that the latter connotes a person beholding, which the former does not: they both equally mean “an appearance.”—I am, &c., J. W. K.

Coatham: Nov. 27, 1899.

SIR,—In “E. H.'s” courteous reference to my letter I regret that he has misunderstood me. I did not oppose his objection to the phrase “his brother President” on the principle that one must not challenge an idiom. I opposed it because it was based on what I consider a faulty argument, into which “E. H.” may perhaps have been led by pushing too far his analogy between apples and idioms. We may cut a piece out of an apple and the remainder may be unsound. We may take away part of a phrase in common use and the remainder may be nonsense. But here the similarity ends. Imperfection is proved in the apple but not in the phrase. I opposed the use of this mode of attack, not the challenge.—I am, &c.,

T. A. B.

SIR,—May I ask whether you consider it allowable to employ the preposition “to” (instead of “than”) as used by “E. H.” in the ACADEMY of this week—(“I cannot allow that France is superior to England”)? Information upon this point will be appreciated by—Yours, &c.,

52, Park-road, Loughborough: C. L. HODGKIN.

[Mr. Hodgkin seems to feel that superior is an adjective in the comparative degree. It sounds as if it were; but it is not. To write superior than would be absurd.—E. H.]

Poem Wanted.

SIR,—A customer of mine has asked me to get for him a poem relating to Florence Nightingale, which has as its first verse:

Old Roy, the village veteran,
Was sitting at his ease
Once more within his cottage home,
His children round his knees.

His children ask him about the war he was engaged in, and how he got his scars. He was among the wounded in the trenches before Sebastopol, and found himself being attended to by Florence Nightingale, whom he at first, in his delirium and semi-unconsciousness, took for an angel.

If you can answer me in your Correspondence column I will be very much obliged.—I am, &c.,

Our Prize Competitions.

Result of No. 10 (New Series).

WE asked last week for examples of well-known lines in English poetry the sense of which might be transposed to convey a meaning totally opposite to that intended by the poet, without, however, becoming nonsense. Thus Pope's

One truth is clear—whatever is right, might be altered by an evolutionist to

One truth is clear—whatever is wrong, and defended with perfect success. Among the examples submitted the best seems to be this, sent by Mr. R. F. McCausland, Hawsker Vicarage, Whitby:

The famous line out of Swinburne's Hymn to Proserpine—

A little soul for a little bears up this corpse which is man, might have a spiritual meaning given to it by transposition:

A little corpse for a little bears up this soul which is man,

Other examples follow :

A transposition of

Beasts, urged by us, their fellow-beasts pursue,
And learn of man each other to undo,
Pope's "Windsor Forest,"

to

Men, urged by us, their fellow-men pursue,
And learn of beasts each other to undo, seems truer, and a good exposition of the modern scientist's doctrine of the survival of the fittest. "Us" would, of course, be the aforementioned scientists. [A. H. W., Westward Ho!]

In these days of workmen's strikes and Employers' Liability Bills, &c., &c., one can imagine that many would prefer to exclaim

He is well satisfied that is well paid, rather than

He is well paid that is well satisfied.
Merchant of Venice.
[H. G. H., Ruswarp.]

An honest God's the noblest work of man.

"No irreverence in this—simply the corollary to 'Man made God in his own image.'"

[A. G., Gourock.]

Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting,

to

Our birth is but awakening and remembrance.
[G. M. P., Birmingham.]

All the world's a stage, &c.,

to

The stage should be a world,
And all the players mostly men and women.
[J. D. A., Ealing.]

Dr. Watts' once familiar line—

The mind's the standard of the man, would express an equal truth if it read :

The man's the standard of the mind.
[J. P., Fenton.]

Pope, and following him Hayes, the American, have said :

He serves his party best who serves the country most.

Is it not truer of the modern Cabinet system, and especially of politicians like Lord Rosebery, to transpose the words "party" and "country" in Pope's line, and say,

He serves his country most who serves his party best?
[R. N., Cambridge.]

Wisdom is oftentimes nearer when we stoop
Than when we soar,
Wordsworth's "The Excursion," may be transposed to Wisdom is oftentimes nearer when we soar

Than when we stoop.
[S. E. M., Edinburgh.]

I should alter Milton's line :

Better to reign in hell than serve in heav'n,

to

Better than reign in hell, to serve in heav'n.
[E. T. S., Reading, and M. E. R., Hertford.]

He makes no friend who never made a foe, Tennyson's "Idylls of the King,"

to

He makes no foe who never made a friend.
[F. B., Cambridge.]

Art is long and time is fleeting,

to

Time is long and art is fleeting.
[J. B. N., York.]

There may be heaven ; there must be hell,
R. Browning's "Time's Revenges,"

to

There must be heaven ; there may be hell.

Competition No. 11 (New Series).

The abstracts of imaginary novels of Miss Austen, some more of which are printed below, were so good and amusing, that we are repeating the competition this week, substituting the author of The Christmas Carol for the author of Pride and Prejudice. We offer a prize of a guinea for the best abstract of an imaginary Christmas story by Charles Dickens. Competitors are restricted to 250 words, and we may remark that, in judging, some emphasis will be laid upon the Dickensian quality of the characters' names.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, December 5. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the first column of p. 614 or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon ; otherwise the first only will be considered. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given : we cannot consider anonymous answers.

We give a few more of the abstracts of imaginary novels by Jane Austen which were prepared for Competition No. 10 :

I have just read Pliability, and find Jane Austen as delightful as ever. Poor little Miss James, striving to please everybody and never quite succeeding because of her unfortunate propensity to say the wrong thing, is a creation hardly inferior to Miss Bates. How I enjoyed her encounters with that self-important gentleman of respectable means but humble origin—Mr. Morris! To hear her complimenting him on the affability of his manners, "so far superior to those of many gentlemen of position ; but of course," thinking of her kind friend Sir John Mather, "pride of birth is quite permissible, indeed commendable." Edward Pendlebury is no more interesting than most of Jane Austen's heroes ; but his meeting with Lucy in the Pump Room at Bath, and the way in which the marriage is made up by his kind-hearted, managing mother, I find quite charming. This morning I read the last chapter, with the wedding over which Mrs. Pendlebury benignly presides, smilingly receiving compliments, and, with busy brain, wondering whom she shall settle next. There also Sir John moves about with dignified courtesy, whilst Miss James flits hither and thither with smiles and well-meaning words for all ; and Mr. Morris condescends to patronise the assembly, even making a few heavy jokes. It grieves me that I have finished this last book of Jane Austen's. Would that another might be discovered!

[E. L., Burton-on-Trent.]

I am enjoying Wendover Priory amazingly, and am got to the chance meeting between Letitia and Captain Stuckley, in Mileom-street. He had thought her still in Derbyshire with her aunt, and was surprised to see Letty and Catherine come out of the milliner's (where they had been to buy "the sweetest hat"). What a charming girl Letty is : Emma's wit, Lizzie's liveliness, and a saucy sweetness all her own. Stuckley is well enough, but wants a dash of the devil to make him "a pretty man." Eh, man, Alan, but ye'd have despised the Captain. Old Dr. Maynard is capital ; a genial, cheery old fellow, and devoted to whist. When the parson and his other cronies are come, and the candles are lit, and the tables set, it does one's heart good to see him draw in his chair and begin the serious business of the evening—whist. He and Mrs. Sarah Battle are kindred spirits. What a charming scene that is looking through the card-room to the long drawing-room where the young folks are dancing—only the Ellises from the Grange, the young Maynards, and Frank Phillips, who is staying with the Misses Hurst at Elmfield. Letty is at the instrument, and they can't persuade the Captain to dance, he's so busy watching her. All the Hampshire scenes are good. Do you remember that morning when Letty is walking in the shrubbery, and Henry and little Charles come rushing out with a letter for her, from Stuckley. She tears it open ; his regiment is ordered to York ; and she hears Ellen thrumming "La Sonnambula" in the morning-room hard by, and thinks the harp music the dreariest in the world.

What do you think of that picnic expedition to Alton Castle? I like it all, from the start at ten (the day was fine, in spite of Aunt Maria's forebodings) in the barouche, the chaise, and Edward's curricle, till when late in the afternoon poor Ellen sprains her ankle on the turret stair.

My favourite chapter of them all is XVIII, where Dr. Maynard meets his early love at the Pump Room at Bath. Mrs. Goulding is inimitable. But read Wendover Priory yourself, my dear fellow, and when you come to Chapter XVIII, think of your friend R. L. S.

[J. D. W., London.]

Abington Manor is delightful, reminding me of Persuasion more than any other of Jane Austen's stories. Mary Selwyn recalls sweet Anne Elliot, and her troubles, like the gentle Anne's, are aggravated by the interference of well-meaning relatives. Do you remember the evening party at the Manor House, where the simpering Miss Burtons sing sentimental ditties and Captain Ellaby plays the flute, the old people meanwhile enjoying a rubber of whist and a gossiping discussion of their new neighbours, the Sandfords, who have just taken the big house on Waltham Hill? How excellent is the episode of the accident on the ice of the Rectory pond and the gallant rescue by Captain Ellaby of little Tommy Burton! Mary, with quiet presence of mind, sends for gardeners, ropes, and a ladder, superintends the warming of beds, &c., whilst the Burton girls, Jane and Selina, do nothing but scream and go into hysterics. Sir William Sandford's behaviour on the outbreak of fire in the book-room is most ludicrous; his pompous manner quite deserting him when his precious memoirs are endangered. Mrs. Selwyn (a feminine Mr. Woodhouse) makes poor Mary's life somewhat a trying one, though matters improve when the scene changes to Bath. Here, however, that black sheep James Burton turns up again—Mary refused him, you remember, in the second chapter—and by his manoeuvres brings about a coolness between Mary and the Captain. What a pity that the fragment breaks off at such an interesting point.

[M. A. C., Cambridge.]

William seems to me the cleverest of all Miss Austen's books. Her touch makes the interest of the neighbourhood in William's matrimonial affairs and the ever-changing rumours about them—which might be both dull and farcical—into brilliant comedy. How characteristic it is of her infallible judgment, that, having had the boldness to make a young man her central figure, she expresses him always in terms of the Winfield ladies!

"William is not merely handsome," remarked his elder aunt.

"No, indeed! He thinks of going into Parliament," supplemented the younger. His mother . . . remarked modestly that "she believed he was steadier than many young men."

"He will make some young lady an excellent husband," sighed Mrs. Weekes; whereupon each of the unmarried ladies present felt herself directly indicated, and blushed.

No one but Jane Austen could have drawn busy Mrs. Weekes. "She was so good-natured that she could not praise either Emily's growth to Mrs. Newton, or Anne's colour to Mrs. Fairfield, without adding, 'and I suppose we shall soon see her Lady Bullen'; and so vigilant that poor Sir William could not salute an acquaintance in passing but she knew the degree and meaning of his bow."

One feels really sorry for all the fair aspirants and their supporters, and for William's relatives—so obligingly ready to bestow the prize on the worthiest—when he suddenly installs the bold, though immature, coquette from the other side of the county (how well she is done and how little her authoress likes her!) at Bullen Hall.

[L. K., London.]

I find Mereham Park very entertaining. How amusing the evening party at the Tempests, where Matilda Lawrence is introduced to the eligible Mr. Crofton, much to the satisfaction of her mother, who in her own mind sees her securely established at Crofton Court, and the dissatisfaction of Mrs. Gresham, who yawns behind her fan, and thinks an arch manner of saying witty things is not altogether ladylike, and unlikely to prove attractive in the eyes of the fastidious Mr. Crofton, and, at any rate, not what her daughters, Jane and Caroline, would be guilty of! Then the self-complacent Mr. Briarley is so good, with his suave manner and air of superiority. His astonishment when Matilda refuses his offer point blank, and his ill-concealed vexation when Mrs. Lawrence, thinking he has stayed quite long enough to have had matters settled, comes in with her congratulations, his abrupt departure, Matilda's explanations to her mother, and Mrs. Lawrence's fainting fit—it is all very telling. What an amiable old gossip Mrs. Knight at the Rectory is, and how she manages the mild, benevolent Vicar, and tries to arrange other people's affairs for them! Is it not amusing when she asks Mr. Crofton to stay to dinner, so that she may get some information from him about his uncle's will for the benefit of her dear friend Mrs. Lawrence! But, on the whole, Matilda is the most captivating, with her sincerity, gaiety, and good humour.

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

FROM THE ALPS TO THE ANDES. BY MATTIAS ZURBRIGGEN.

Zurbriggen, the famous Alpine guide, was the companion of Mr. FitzGerald in 1897, when that explorer was foiled by sickness in his attempt to reach the summit of Aconcagua. Zurbriggen was able to push on to the summit. He saw "the whole of South America" extended below him, and the hotel keeper at Inca gave him enough champagne to make his head ache for two days afterwards. Zurbriggen's account of this great climb is published, curiously enough, a week later than Mr. FitzGerald's narrative of his 1898 expedition. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

THE DRAMA OF YESTERDAY AND TO-DAY.

BY CLEMENT SCOTT.

This is Mr. Clement Scott's autobiography as a dramatic critic. In two large and handsome volumes Mr. Scott assembles all the stage-lore and reminiscences which his observation and memory hold. Mr. Scott plights his love to the stage once more. "My love for the dramatic art, new or old, is only equalled by the comprehensive passion of a Juliet:

My bounty is as boundless as the sea,
My love as deep; the more I give to thee,
The more I have, for both are infinite!"

The volumes are well-illustrated and indexed. (Macmillan. 36s. net.)

PAOLO AND FRANCESCA.

BY STEPHEN PHILLIPS.

The tragedy in four acts, commissioned by Mr. George Alexander, and accepted for production at the St. James's Theatre, is now published. Readers are therefore permitted to discover its beauties in advance of playgoers. Mr. Alexander retains the entire acting rights. (John Lane. 4s. 6d. net.)

PRÆ-RAPHAELITE DIARIES AND LETTERS.

EDITED BY WILLIAM MICHAEL ROSSETTI.

These are unpublished miscellaneous records of the Præ-Raphaelite Brotherhood, about whom many people, we fancy, would like to hear the last word. The present collection consists of letters, diaries, &c. Scrappy but very human records, they are likely to fulfil the editor's modest hope that they will inform in some parts, and in parts amuse. THE ENGLISH CHURCH (597-1066).

BY WILLIAM HUNT.

This volume signalises the beginning of a large literary enterprise. It is intended to write the history of the English Church in seven volumes, written by competent scholars, agreed in their general principles, each being responsible for a period to which he has devoted special attention. The work will be carried out under the general editorship of the Dean of Winchester, and the story will be carried far enough to include the Evangelical Movement in the eighteenth century. THE EARLY MARRIED LIFE OF MARIA JOSEPHA, LADY STANLEY.

EDITED BY
JANE H. ADEANE.

Readers of The Girlhood of Maria Josepha Holroyd will be glad to see this sumptuous record of the early married life of the same lady. Both she and her husband were brought up among the makers of history. On the title-page of this new volume are printed these lines:

The grace of God and a quiet life,
A mind content and an honest wife,
A good report and a friend in store—
What need a man to wish for more?

(Longmans. 18s.)

HEROES of the NINETEENTH CENTURY.

By G. BARNETT SMITH, Author of "History of the English Parliament," "Life of Gladstone," &c. First Series.—Wellington, Garibaldi, Gordon, Grant. Second Series.—Nelson, Roberts, Sir Chas. Napier, Livingstone. Large crown 8vo. Each Volume well illustrated. Cloth gilt, bevelled boards, gilt edges. Price 5s. each.

"'Heroes of the Nineteenth Century' is a timely publication. Within the covers of the two handsome volumes Mr. G. Barnett Smith tells the life stories of Nelson and Wellington, Garibaldi and Napier, Grant and Roberts, and Gordon and Livingstone. It is a glory-roll of heroes whose deeds, although familiar, recapitulation fails to deprive of their fascination. The author has been conspicuously successful in combining comprehensiveness with the necessary brevity, and in bringing out clearly the salient points in the careers of these heroes. The illustrations are good, and the portraits are in every case excellently reproduced. It is a gallery of builders of the Empire which appeals strongly to one's patriotism, and it is therefore a book to be bought."—Pall Mall Gazette.

This History of the Dress of the Royal Artillery is one of the most artistic books ever produced on British Military Dress, and one of the most extended in period. # The Origin and Growth of the English Constitution.

AN HISTORICAL TREATISE.

In which is drawn out, by the light of the most recent researches, the gradual development of the English constitutional system, and the growth out of that system of the Federal Republic of the United States.

By HANNIS TAYLOR, LL.D.,

LATE MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY OF THE UNITED STATES TO SPAIN.

In Two Octavo Volumes, the Set 36s. Sixth Edition, Vol. I.; First Edition, Vol. II.

Formally adopted as a Text Book by the University of Dublin. In Use at the Universities of Oxford and Edinburgh. Adopted either as a Text Book or Book of Reference by many of the leading American Universities and Law Schools.

"The completion of the second volume rounds out one of the most important recent achievements of American scholarship."

Review of Reviews, November, 1898.

"The freshness and originality of his views and the air of impartiality and tolerance which is conspicuous in his writing may be attributed to the 'semi-detached' position which, as an American, he is able to take up.....The account of the jury is the best to be found anywhere."

English Historical Review, October, 1899.

"I may congratulate you on the production of a piece of sound, thorough, and interesting work."

Rt. Rev. WILLIAM STUBBS,

Lord Bishop of Oxford.

"I congratulate you on having finished so great a task, and given the most valuable illustration of the unity of history in tracing the principles of the Constitution from its early beginnings in the England of the seventh and eighth centuries to its latest developments in the United States as well as in England. I trust that it may take an important place in historical and constitutional teaching in our Universities."

Rt. Hon. JAMES BRYCE,

Author of "The American Commonwealth."

"I have already read a good deal, here and there, in your monumental work. Your plan of treating the constitutional history of England and the United States as a connected whole strikes me as particularly happy. The book must be the outcome of enormous research."

THOMAS E. HOLLAND, D.C.L.,

Chichele Professor of International Law and Diplomacy, University of Oxford.

"No other book exhibits so clear a view of the English Constitution, 'broadening down from precedent to precedent.'"

MONTAGU BURROWS,

Chichele Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford.

"The work is, in my judgment, a masterly, philosophical, and exhaustive treatment of the most important chapter of political history which the world has ever seen or is likely to see."

EDWARD J. PHILLIPS,

Late United States Minister to England.

"The work gives every promise of becoming recognised as an authoritative summary of the entire evolution of Anglo-American constitutional liberty and government."—New York Law Journal.

A New Book by the Author of "Ricroft of Withens."

BY MOOR and FELL. By HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE. Being Landscape and Lang-Fettle Talk in West Yorkshire. Illustrated by George Hering. Cloth, 6s.

Mr. Sutcliffe is a Yorkshireman, and has brought to the task of showing the stranger about his county the enthusiasm of a native and the power of picturesque presentation and arrangement of the novelist. It will be remembered that the Yorkshire local colour of his two principal novels, "Ricroft" and "A Man of the Moors," was held to be peculiarly successful.

"By Moor and Fell" deals with a comparatively little known corner of Yorkshire—Wharfedale, Airedale, and the Haworth country. Its aim is to preserve the life of the people, the turn of their humour, their outlook on the world—to rescue or to recall half-forgotten tales of the countryside—to give the feel of the scenery and its effect upon the character of those who live among it. The author has tried more especially to give the atmosphere of the real Haworth, as it was and is, distinct from its association with the Brontës, and to restore the legends and traditions which are being ousted by the dry bones of fact from Skipton and the historic Craven country. The book will be very fully illustrated, and the drawings, like the letterpress, aim at catching the spirit, not only of the scenery and more prominent bits of architecture, but also of the country-people and their ways—here a cottage-interior, and there a hay-mowing scene, or a village tap-room on Saturday night.

THE FRANCO-GERMAN WAR.

BY

GENERALS and other OFFICERS

WHO TOOK PART IN THE CAMPAIGN

(GENERALS BOGUSLAWSKI, von der GOLTZ, HOLLEBEN, &c.)

Translated and Edited by Major-General J. F. MAURICE, C.B., Commanding Woolwich District; Capt. WILFRED J. LONG, and A. SONNENSCHNEIN.

With Hundreds of PLATES, PORTRAITS, MAPS, BATTLE-PLANS, &c. 700 pages, imperial 8vo, 21s.

"It is not surprising that there should have been a demand in Germany for some great historic treatment of the weighty theme which should bring out all its aspects with a completeness and a correctness, and at the same time with a literary grace and skill such as it had been impossible that the Official History should attain. Fit writers were not wanting. What was manifestly needed was that first of all the place of the contest in the World's History should be properly assigned to it, and that then the men who carried on the work should be vividly presented to us, so that instead of mere marches and counter-marches, attacks and counter-attacks, cannonades, outflankings, and such-like military detail, the story should be presented as a genuine human encounter of mind against mind, of leader against leader, of nation against nation, and that the underlying causes of strength and weakness, national as much as military, historical as well as momentary, should be laid before us. It is this that has been attempted in the book here presented for the first time to the English reader. The enthusiasm with which it has been received in Germany is of course special, and hardly to be expected elsewhere; but those of us who, as foreigners, have read it in its original form, have, I think I may say, one and all been impressed by the pains which have been taken by the publishers and editors to make it as perfect as possible. Even a casual glance over the illustrations, the portraits, the plans of battles, and the maps, will show that this great national work has been a labour of love, and with what exhaustive effort the task has been carried through. For those who know something of the political and military literature of Germany, the list of names of the writers will be a yet stronger guarantee that it is in all respects first-rate. All of them have a European reputation. That among English soldiers this volume will be received with a hearty welcome I have no doubt; but I think that it appeals also to a far wider audience, and that the qualities which were displayed in the patriotic effort which has given to Europe thirty years of peace are such as will enlist the sympathies of the whole English-speaking race."—Extract from GENERAL MAURICE'S Preface.

A Remarkable Offer.

The "Library of Famous Literature," about to be issued by The Standard under the editorship of Dr. Richard Garnett, C.B., promises to be the great success of the year. Under the remarkable advance-of-publication offer made by The Standard, subscriptions have already been booked for 4,000 sets, involving a total of 80,000 volumes. Yet The Standard's first announcement of the new work appeared but a few weeks ago. It is to be doubted if such an advance sale was ever before known in England.

AN UNPRECEDENTED OPPORTUNITY.

True, the introductory offer made by The Standard is a remarkable one. The "Library of Famous Literature" will not be issued in parts nor by single volumes, but only in complete sets. The work is nearly ready for delivery, and to those who subscribe now, in advance of the day of publication, The Standard offers the Library at a reduction of one-half the regular prices hereafter to prevail, and upon the most liberal terms. The entire twenty volumes will be sent, all at one time, upon the preliminary payment of but half-a-guinea. The purchase of the work is to be completed in small monthly payments according to the style of binding chosen.

THE BEST THE AGES CAN OFFER.

The Library is a superb treasury of literature that comes marvellously near to including everything that is worth reading in the literature of all the ages since the making of books began; it distils the vital essence, it brings together in a single set of volumes the immortal part of the literature and wisdom of the world. Nothing is here that is not of value beyond question, nothing, too, that is not of deep and genuine human interest, that has indeed been the test. Nothing has been chosen because it was great once, but because it will be interesting and fruitful for living men and women of to-day.

The best of all the ages has been gathered here, the dross refined away, leaving only gold; of Homer, or Cicero, or Caesar, to go far back, only what will afford an agreeable evening. Through one volume after another we march down the centuries, plucking a grape here, a flower there, getting a better idea of the blossoming times of literature than we might otherwise obtain, through months of unaided, unguided, and toilsome effort. And all this while we are being pleasantly entertained, all without boredom, without a thought of being instructed or lectured.

A REAL UNIVERSITY.

Indeed, since all has here been systematised and sifted, one might in the course of a season's study, acquire a firmer grasp of the world's literature than from years of desultory reading, or even from an extended College education. It seems as if one might plan out endless courses of reading for one's leisure hour, and, in truth, find endlessly without exhausting this vast mine. The "Library of Famous Literature" is, as it were, a University not merely for the years of adolescence, but one which we may attend with pleasure and profit a whole life long.

10,000 CHOICE PAGES.

Of the vast scope of the Library it is next to impossible to convey an adequate idea. It is complete in twenty handsomely bound volumes, of royal octavo size, and the subscriber has the choice of four different styles of binding, at varying prices. It is printed on an especially light paper, made for the work; easy to hold and delightful to read. The twenty volumes comprise 10,000 pages of the best literature of the world, printed in large clear type, likewise made especially for this work.

WHAT THESE TWENTY HANDSOME VOLUMES CONTAIN.

It is difficult, if not absurd, to attempt to convey an adequate idea of so great a work. It is much like endeavouring to give a friend an idea of a vast exposition, such as, for example, that which will be held in Paris next year, by sending him a few extracts from the catalogue. THE LIBRARY OF FAMOUS LITERATURE is precisely what its title indicates—a huge treasury of the finest and most interesting pieces of literature, from the dawn of civilisation down to and including the authors of our own day—that is to say, from the old Babylonian story of Istar and the quaint Egyptian tale of Two Brothers, the most ancient pieces of literature extant, to the best work of living writers, like Tolstoy, Hardy, Swinburne, Mark Twain, or Kipling. It contains everything: the great classics like the Iliad and the Odyssey; wonderful stories like the great Bharata Tale (the Mahabharata of the Ancient Hindoos); poetry and stories from every people who ever lived and sung; the best of history, from writers like Mommsen and Curtius, Freeman and Froude, Gibbon and Green; bits of adventure and stories of wild life; the pith of the great philosophers like Hobbes and Locke and Hume and Spencer; fascinating chapters of science from writers like Huxley and Darwin and Proctor; famous letters from famous writers of letters; oratorical masterpieces from Demosthenes and Cicero to John Bright and Gladstone; choice pages from the intimate thoughts of diarists like Amiel and Samuel Pepys; epigrams and maxims from men like La Rochefoucauld and Dean Swift; philosophical reflections from writers like Rousseau and Pascal; religious writings like those of Cardinal Newman, Thomas à Kempis, and Dean Farrar; biting sarcasm from a Heine or an Ibsen; pathos and humour from writers like Charles Lamb, Bret Harte, or Oliver Wendell Holmes; fables from La Fontaine; autobiographies like Benjamin Franklin's; in fine, the whole gamut of literary production, from grave to gay, from the deepest questions that concern the human soul to the lightest jests of a Horace, a Sterne, a Rabelais, or a Max O'Rell.

FAMOUS AUTHORS AT HOME.

In addition thereto, the Library is richly embellished with 500 full-page illustrations and coloured plates, printed separately from the text on enamelled paper. There are portraits of the most famous authors who ever lived, there is a delightful series of PICTURES OF AUTHORS' HOMES, and a still more novel series of FAMOUS AUTHORS IN THEIR HOMES. So, too, their haunts are shown, the scenes of memorable passages in their books, and other places celebrated in literature or in history. The coloured plates, too, add a unique interest to the work. They run through each volume, and comprise the choicest specimens of the rare art of book illumination in the days when books were made by hand, and the transcription and embellishment of a single volume often occupied years of labour.

There are two great indexes, one general, the other topical, comprising 10,000 entries, and rendering every page and almost every paragraph of the Library instantly accessible. Though primarily a Library of the best reading, it thus becomes an admirable work for reference as well.

"It is," as The Bookman so tersely described it, "infinite riches in a little room."

SPECIAL OFFER.

Those who subscribe now, in advance of publication, may obtain the Complete Work, Twenty Volumes, AT A REDUCTION OF FIFTY PER CENT. from the regular prices hereafter to prevail. The Library is not sold in parts, or by single volumes, but only in complete sets. The entire Twenty Volumes will be sent, all at one time, upon a preliminary payment of but HALF-A-GUINEA; further payments, after the Twenty Volumes are in your home, to be at the rate of 9, 12, 15, or 21 shillings per month, according to the binding.

A HANDSOMELY ILLUSTRATED PROSPECTUS.

If you will state that you read this notice in the ACADEMY, The Standard will send, post paid to any address, a large illustrated Prospectus of the LIBRARY OF FAMOUS LITERATURE, together with specimen pages, pages from the index, and the like. But those who prefer to file their subscriptions at once, and thus take advantage of the Special Prices, which are offered in advance of the day of publication, may examine the work, in the different styles of binding, at The Standard Office, 23, St. Bride-street, near Ludgate-circus; at "Mitchell's" Royal Subscription Library, 33, Old Bond-street, W.; at the Civil Service Stores, 28, Haymarket; and at the Junior Army and Navy Stores, Waterloo-place, where orders may be booked, both for cash payments and on monthly instalments.

If you do not wish to cut this slip out, carefully state that you saw this notice in the ACADEMY. Otherwise the Prospectus cannot be sent.

The Literary Week.

ON page 685 will be found a statement in reference to our Awards to Authors. Full particulars will be given in our next issue.

IBSEN's new play is to be published in Copenhagen on the 19th of this month. Its title has been badly translated by such journals as have paid any attention to the event. It is not "When we are dead we awake," as people seem to think, but "When we dead awaken"—"Naar vi Døde Vaagner."

ON another page we give an interesting list of books, principally new, which have most pleased and interested certain well-known public persons and men and women of letters during 1899. Other replies will be printed next week; but, meanwhile, it is worth noting that the order of popularity is as follows:

1. The Letters of R. L. Stevenson.
2. Mr. Lecky's Map of Life.
3. Mr. Phillips's Paula and Francesca.
(Mr. Phillpotts's The Human Boy.)
4. { Duchess of Sutherland's One Hour and the Next.
    Mr. Gosse's Life of Donne.
    Miss Cholmondeley's Red Pottage.

With the exception of The Human Boy, all these books belong to the last three months.

UNDETERRED by the chequered career of his Appreciations and Addresses, Lord Rosebery has given permission for his essay on Peel, in the first number of the Anglo-Saxon Review, to be issued as a small book by Messrs. Cassell. Lord Rosebery's monograph on Chatham, a literary heritage from Mr. John Morley, is now in the press.

THE new editor of the Chronicle is Mr. W. J. Fisher, whose connexion with the paper began some eighteen years ago. Mr. Fisher is one of the old school of journalists. That is to say, he knows every department of his work. Mr. Fisher has occupied various posts on the Chronicle, including that of foreign editor, leader writer, and latterly assistant editor. During Mr. Massingham's illness he acted as editor, assisted by Mr. L. F. Austin. Mr. Fisher's politics, which are Liberal and Imperialist—or certainly not the reverse of Imperialist—may be considered to be those of the Chronicle of the immediate future.

MR. MASSINGHAM's retirement from the Chronicle was followed at once by that of two of his colleagues, Mr. Harold Spender and Mr. Vaughan Nash, and now we learn of the resignation also of Mr. Charles Williams, the war correspondent. Mr. Williams's daily article, entitled "The Diary of the War," will henceforth be found in the Morning Leader.

THESE are not the only changes in journalism. Mr. Crook, of the Echo, is about to retire owing, we understand, to some difference concerning the Boer War between himself and one of the directors of the paper. Another change, but this time not in editing but publishing, is the transfer of the Contemporary Review from Messrs. Isbister to the Columbus Publishing Co., which will also issue the Topical Times. Mr. Bunting will continue at the head of the Contemporary; but it is hard to reconcile so close a union between that respected review and the sprightly sheet which is known to its Corinthian admirers as the "T. T."

THE Nova Anthologia Oxoniensis, a collection of Latin and Greek versions representing contemporary Oxonian scholarship, edited by Prof. Robinson Ellis and Mr. A. G. Godley, is being issued from the Clarendon Press for the Christmas season. Among the living translated poets are Mr. George Meredith, Mr. Swinburne, Mr. Lang, Mr. Watson, Sir Lewis Morris, and Mr. Alfred Austin.

THE first volumes of Messrs. Methuen's "Little Library" are now published—three volumes of Vanity Fair and one of Tennyson's Princess: the second Princess, by the way, to reach us this week, for it has just been added to Messrs. Macmillan's "Golden Treasury" series. The Vanity Fair is particularly satisfactory. The hue of red chosen for its cover is warm and attractive, the books are well-printed, the frontispieces, by Mr. Jacomb-Hood, well chosen and executed (but there ought to be a word or two referring to their place in the text), and Mr. Stephen Gwynn's introduction is informing and direct. The "Little Library" has made an auspicious start.

THE serial publication of Tolstoi's Resurrection, which has been interrupted owing to the author's irregular work upon the novel and his continual desire to make important organic alterations, will be resumed after Christmas and go on to the end without another hitch. But already, we fear, there has been enough tinkering and irresolution to ruin it as a work of art.

IT is not generally known that Cromwell published a Soldiers' Catechism for the use of the Commonwealth Army as a companion to the Soldiers' Pocket Bible. Two copies only of the Catechism are known to exist. One of these is in the possession of the Rev. Walter Begley, and is about to be republished by Mr. Elliot Stock in facsimile. Mr. Begley will add a short preface to the reprint.

THE new Sunday magazine that is to contain the "Life of Christ" which Ian Maclaren has written may be expected at the middle of the month. It is to be called the Sunday Strand. The title, taken in connexion with the popularity of the Strand Magazine, is a good one, but had that periodical not paved the way, it would be quite meaningless, or worse.

MR. WILLIAM ARCHER's lecture on an ideal theatre, delivered to the members of the Playgoer's Club last Sunday night, has already borne some fruit, for a correspondent of the Chronicle has come forward with an offer of £100 to the funds.

MR. LESLIE STEPHEN has prefaced the collection of James Payn's last essays, entitled The Backwater of Life, with a little biography and character-sketch of his life-long friend which is in its way perfect. Therein the man is revealed just as he was. One passage is particularly interesting to other writers, where Mr. Stephen comments on Payn's remark: "If I were to live twenty lives I would choose no other profession [than the literary]. It is the brightest and most genial of them all, and so far at least as my experience goes, the most free from jealousies and acrimonies." Says Mr. Stephen:

Yet the profession has its characteristic temptations; as, for example, to superficiality, to craving for notoriety, and to cynical indifference to truth. The problem whether you should do your best or do what pays best for the moment occurs with painful persistency, and too often leads, if not to the wrong choice, to an unsatisfactory compromise. Payn's remarkable freedom from some of these characteristic weaknesses was due above all to a quality which he rightfully claimed; whatever else he might have been, he said, he was "natural." That was indisputably true. He had taken to literature as some people take to drink, simply because he could not help it. It was his nature. But he was also much too simple to take his impulse for a proof of supereminence, or to set down failure to the malignity of critics or the stupidity of mankind. He accepted the position for which experience proved him to be fitted, learned to understand his own powers, and did them full justice by good, honest, hard work.

Mr. Payn was also to a large extent protected. He led a sheltered life although in the midst of literary activities. And he was not gifted, or cursed, with that excessive imaginative sympathy which can lead to so much suffering—and so much rapture.

THE following account of his methods of work which Mr. Stephen gives is sufficient explanation of Payn's extreme satisfaction with the literary life and blindness to its paltrinesses:

When a story struck him as specially suitable, it was worked up into an episode, or perhaps became the plot, of one of his novels. I often had the opportunity of watching the process. I would look in upon him at his office, and be greeted with some quaint narrative which had come in his way. . . . Then it would be gradually elaborated. He would write down the names of the imaginary characters on a sheet of cardboard, each at the head of a column. Then the necessary dates and facts would be inserted in the appropriate columns, till a full scheme was drawn out and all points of genealogy and so forth made abundantly clear. A writer who was liable to fits of lofty inspiration might perhaps be trammelled by so methodical a procedure. For Payn's purpose—the clear-cut possible development of an ingenious situation—is answered, I think, very well; and, whatever limits there might be to his talent, the reader might at least be sure of having a thoroughly clear, bright narrative, written with unflagging spirit.

In other words, James Payn did not take literature seriously. But he wrote charmingly and genially, and the world was the better for him.

THIS week we notice elsewhere a selection of Tales from Boccaccio which Mr. Joseph Jacobs has made and Mr. Byam Shaw has illustrated. Such transcripts have, of course, been made before—among others, in verse, by the late James Payn. Mr. Leslie Stephen, speaking of this little book, with which Payn's career was beginning, says that George Brimley praised it, and Payn said of the review that it was "like ten thousand tonics in a single dose." He always called it to mind when himself reviewing a young author.

MR. FISHER UNWIN, who has always been enterprising and ingenious, is now issuing an annual entitled Unwin's

Chap-Book. It serves both as an advertiser and a magazine, for though only the books that are published by Mr. Unwin are drawn upon and described, the extracts which they afford make for good mixed reading. Among the original matter is an interview with a publisher's reader of ten years' experience, among whose pronouncements we find these:

Delicate work sells worst, because very few people understand delicate work. In general the great public will buy anything that is not too individual in its sensationalism, crudeness, or vulgarity. For clever work, not unconventional in the ideas it brings, there is a fair market.

The nervous temperament of the artist is betrayed, to a certain extent, by the character of his handwriting. There are certain common forms of commonplace or mediocre handwriting, which are never seen to express delicate or original work.

The publisher's reader's aim should be to let nothing that he holds is good go unpublished. The expenses of delicate and original work, especially of the work of beginners, should be paid out of the sales of the popular and successful works.

In connexion with this sentiment, in which we believe, we may say that Mr. Leslie Stephen, when palliating James Payn's mistake of rejecting John Inglesant for Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co., remarks that the only point for Payn's consideration when reading the MS. was its chance of commercial success.

PORTRAITS by telegraph are among the new discoveries of science. At the Philadelphia International Exposition this year a wired portrait of Mr. Zangwill was given away by the Philadelphia Inquirer. The portrait, which is not a good one, we reproduce from Unwin's Chap-Book. It is described there as a portrait without prejudice, but we seem to detect prejudice, none the less. Mr. Zangwill is not quite like that.

THE happy notion of collecting from various well-known writers the history of the way in which they earned their first guinea has occurred to Miss Maud Churton, and the result of her inquiries may be found in Pearson's Magazine for December. Mr. Conan Doyle earned his by a story in Chambers's Journal in 1878, called "The Mystery of Sarsassa Valley," for which he was paid three guineas. "Sarah Grand" also earned her first guinea—which was thirty shillings—from Chambers's Journal, with an essay on the binding of Chinese women's feet. Mr. Bernard Shaw's first guinea was fifteen shillings, but he does not say how he earned it. Mr. H. G. Wells's first money came from the Family Herald; Mr. Crockett's from a Glasgow newspaper; Mr. Rider Haggard's from the Gentleman's Magazine for an account of a Zulu war dance; Mr. Clement Scott's from Tom Hood's weekly, Saturday Night; and Mr. Alfred Harmsworth's from an article in one of the Illustrated London News' publications. Miss Churton has not always met with complaisance. Mr. Jerome and Mr. Anthony Hope declined politely to enlighten her, while Ouida wrote: "If Miss Churton do not succeed in literature, her failure will certainly not be due to want of effrontery."

An opportunity for enterprising authors comes from Sierra Leone. The Board of Education there offers a prize of £20 to be given to the writer of a small history of Sierra Leone which shall be considered by a committee the most suitable as a text-book to be used in the schools of the Colony. This is not all. The history must also be approved by the Governor. It would be very hard on a competitor if the committee approved his history and the Governor did not. If no book is approved by the committee a prize of £10 will be given to the author of the best, but it will not be published. The book should not contain more than 75,000 words, and it should be sent to the Clerk to the Board of Education, Freetown, Sierra Leone, by July 31, 1900. The copyright of the work belongs to the author. Further particulars may be obtained from the Clerk.

THE pastime of selecting the best books for children, which occupied some of our readers very pleasantly in the past summer and has lately been a popular amusement in America, is now brought to the notice of the readers of the Daily News. That paper offers a prize of £10 for the list of the hundred best books for children. Lists must be sent in on or before Monday, December 11.

MR. BIRRELL has already written of Charles Lamb as well as any man living—indeed, we fancy that the passages in his books which relate to Elia may endure longest of all his work—and now, in his Introduction to the illustrated edition of The Essays of Elia, a picture from which we reproduce elsewhere, he writes once again sympathetically and penetratingly of that frail being whom Thackeray called Saint Charles. We quote a notable passage:

Lamb, like his own child-angel, was "to know weakness, and reliance, and the shadow of human imbecility." He went with a lame gait. He used to get drunk somewhat too frequently. Let the fact be stated in all its deformity—he was too fond of gin-and-water. He once gave a lady the welcome assurance that he never got drunk twice in the same house. Failing all evidence to the contrary, we are bound to believe this to be true. It is a mitigating circumstance. Wordsworth's boundless self-conceit, Coleridge's maddening infirmity of purpose, Hazlitt's petulance, De Quincey's spitefulness, knew no such self-denying ordinance. Lamb was also a too inveterate punster, and sometimes, it may be, pushed a jest, or baited a bore, beyond the limits of becoming mirth. When we have said these things against Lamb we have said all. Pale Malice, speckled Jealousy, may now be invited to search the records of his life, to probe his motives, to read his private letters, to pry into his desk, to dissect his character. Baffled, beaten, and disappointed, they fall back. An occasional intoxication which hurt no one but himself, which blinded him to no duty, which led him into no extravagance, which in no way interfered with the soundness of his judgment, the charity of his heart, or the independence of his life, and a shower of bad puns—behold the faults of Elia! His virtues—noble, manly, gentle—are strewn over every page of his life, and may be read in every letter he ever wrote.

AND this also is good and well put:

The lives of authors, if only written with a decent measure of truthfulness and insight, are, generally speaking, better reading than their works. It would be hard to explain why the lives of men so querulous, so affected, so centred in self, so averse to the probing of criticism, so blind to the smallness of their fame as most authors stand revealed in their biographies and letters to have been, should yet be so incessantly interesting. They succeed one another quickly enough—these biographies; doing each one of them its bit of iconoclastic work: yet the reader never tires of them, nor, unless he is very young, does he wreak an empty wrath upon the fragments of another broken idol. Far otherwise: he picks up the pieces reverently, and remembering how hard and self-engrossing is the labour of carrying out any high plan of literary excellence, how furious the fever occasioned by the thought of perfection, how hot the hell of failure—puts them carefully away, and thanks God his mother bore him as destitute of genius as of clothing.

But none the less we pine after the ideal. We want our favourite authors to be our best-loved men. Smashing idols is an irreverent occupation endurable only in our wilder hours. A time comes in most men's lives when the bell rings for prayer, and unhappy are they who, when it does, have nowhere to carry their heart's supplications.

It is, therefore, a pleasant thing when we find ourselves saying of Charles Lamb, that it is impossible to know whether we most admire the author, or love the man.

in proof that the pen is mightier than the sword. The proof is not established.

MR. GOLDWIN SMITH's new book, The United Kingdom: A Political History, which is to be published immediately by Messrs. Macmillan & Co., recounts in broad outline the steps by which England has taken the lead of the world in solving the problem of constitutional government. Beginning with the Teutonic conquest, it follows gradually the growth of the kingdom's functions—of throne, Church, laws, Parliament, municipalities, commerce, Navy and Army—up to the final establishment of the Constitution as we know it to-day. The first volume, which is occupied chiefly with tracing origins, takes the history down to the close of Cromwell's protectorate; the second follows out the working and development of political forces from the Restoration to the overthrow of the Whig party after the Reform Act. The last chapter, which surveys the Empire as it now exists, has a special interest at this moment. In tracing the political history of Canada—as the oldest and most typical of our great Colonies—the historian records the solution, hitherto successful, of a problem closely resembling that which now confronts us in South Africa.

THE Daily News has discovered a real treasure, in the shape of a volume of Portuguese sonnets, translated into English by Señor Flavio Pinto Leite. We borrow a few quotations from our contemporary. This is from a love poem:

It misgives me that mine absence and ill-luck
Mav in thy engagingly smitten soul
Garble the grist of self-control
And nip the transports of my duck.

The lady's name is Marilia, in whose "skittish eyes sweet loves their torches kindle." Elsewhere Marilia is assured that she is "Heaven's mash most beaming," which suggests that the Señor has not always been to the best sources for his English. In his more rhetorical manner we have this:

What greater, what arranter confusion
Than in distraction's murk to wander,
Balking disenchantment's notion?

What, in leed?

To Captain Mahan, it seems, we are indirectly indebted for Sir Herbert Maxwell's huge Life of Wellington. Had not Captain Mahan's Life of Nelson seemed to the publishers to need a companion this book might never have been written. Thus book begets book.

In future the Badminton Magazine will be published by Mr. Heinemann. Mr. Alfred E. T. Watson remains as editor. A new series of articles by Mr. F. C. Selous will represent that hunter's experiences in the Rocky Mountains. Among the fiction will be a new story by the authors of Some Experiences of an Irish R. M.

Bibliographical.

THE Bibliography of Omar Khayyâm promised by Mr. Temple Scott will be very welcome; for, though something of the sort is included in the volume published by Mr. Heron-Allen last year, it "does not pretend to anything like completeness." The bibliographical information brought together by Mr. Haskell Dole, in his "Multi-variorum" Edition of FitzGerald's poem, would probably satisfy most people, but then that edition is not on sale in this country—more's the pity. It is to be hoped that Mr. Scott may be allowed to include in his Bibliography references to the original verse, in celebration of Omar, recited at successive dinners of the Omar Khayyâm Club. (I hear there is some chance of those poems being brought out by and by.) At the Club Dinner on Friday last the bard was Mr. William Sharp, who in his last two quatrains (there were fourteen) contrived to be "topical," declaring that Omar, had he been present that night,

Remembering Youth and War, a cup would plight
To where our Brothers drink a redder wine
And fight our long, slow, patient, world-round Fight.

Said Mr. Sharp:

Undaunted still our World-round war we wage;
From Asian Chitral to the Yellow River
The Kin of Omar write a Death's Page!

It was notable that in all the speeches that evening there was only one reference to FitzGerald, the man to whom the Omar Khayyâm Club clearly owes its existence.

A new story by the author of Olive Varcoe—that does carry the memory back a long way! Why one should remember Olive Varcoe I do not precisely know, for, so far as I can recollect, it was a work of no great consequence. Still, the title, at any rate, remains familiar! The writer, Mrs. Notley, has been silent for some time. There is no record of any book from her pen since 1888, though, of course, she may have published anonymously. She issued a three-volume novel in 1883 (Red Riding Hood), and another in 1885 (Mind, Body, and Estate). The new story is to be called Good Luck; but surely that title has been used before, and more than once? I fancy Mrs. L. T. Meade has utilised it within recent years. Another jog is given to the memory by the publication of The Finger of Fate, by Captain Mayne Reid. The tale so called first appeared early in the 'seventies. The present edition, however, is a re-written version of the original, prepared by the author just before his death. The best title that Mayne Reid ever invented was that of The Headless Horseman. What a thrill it gave!

I see that Mr. J. T. Grein proposes to call his forthcoming volume Dramatic Criticism. Apart from the fact that no criticism can properly be described as "dramatic," the title is a little vague and indeterminate. Curiously enough, the phrase "dramatic criticism" forms the headline of every page in the book which Mr. Joseph Knight published, in 1893, under the name of Theatrical Notes. Mr. Knight's work covers the ground between November, 1874, and December, 1879. Mr. Grein did not come to the front in theatrical matters till the battle of criticism began to be fought over the unlucky form of Dr. Ibsen. He has been for some time the correspondent in London of La Revue de l'Art Dramatique, writing in French, which he handles with as much freedom and dexterity as English. He now contributes signed notices of the theatre to a London Sunday newspaper.

Talking of the theatre, I fear there may be controversy over the title-page of a little book just issued—The Story of Lewis Carroll, Told for Young People by the Real Alice in Wonderland, Miss Isa Bowman. I don't suppose that Miss Bowman means to convey that she was the Alice to whom the story was originally told; but if she desires it to be understood that she was the first to represent Alice on the stage, then the desire is disingenuous, for the first impersonator of Alice on the boards (Prince of Wales' Theatre, London, December, 1886) was a little girl named Phœbe Carlo. The part was not played by Miss Isa Bowman till December, 1888 (at the Globe Theatre).

Mrs. Henry de la Pasture, whose Adam Grigson is, I suppose, one of the successes of the season, is saluted by a monthly contemporary as a "new writer," and, as such, discoursed of. New she is no doubt, in a sense, but she produced The Little Squire just six years ago; in the following year came A Toy Tragedy; and at the end of '97 she gave us Deborah of Tod's. There is some chance that she may make a reputation as a writer for the stage. "The Modern Craze," the one-act piece which she contributes to the afternoon programme at St. George's Hall, is of unquestionable cleverness, though suggestive of "A Pantomime Rehearsal."

Scarcely a month passes but there is some addition to Dickens literature. If nothing new occurs to a devoted Dickensian, he goes and does again what has been done by somebody else. Eight or nine years ago there appeared a book called Dickens-Land: A Week's Tramp. Now we are told to expect a volume entitled Rambles in Dickens-Land, by R. Allbutt. Dickens-Land, one would think, had already been sufficiently explored by the faithful—especially that part of it contained within The Pickwick Papers. I fancy, by the way, that this Rambles in Dickens-Land is a new edition of Rambles in London with Charles Dickens, with country matter added. THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Mr. Stephen Phillips's Tragedy.

Paolo and Francesca. A Tragedy in Four Acts. By Stephen Phillips. (John Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE publication of Mr. Stephen Phillips's tragedy is in itself a notable thing and derives a peculiar interest from the special circumstances attending it. As Mr. Phillips tells—we might rather say reminds—us in a note prefixed to the book, Paolo and Francesca was written for Mr. George Alexander, and though its production has been delayed, is still held in reserve for performance. Under the circumstances of this delay, and with Mr. Alexander's assent, it is now laid before the reading public. It is an unusual thing to have the opportunity of mastering a new play previous to its performance; and in the case of literary drama, it is, we think, a precedent which might be followed without loss to the manager, and with gain both to author and public. A first-night verdict might, under such conditions, be a more reliable thing than it is at present. The critics, at least, would be able to pronounce a more deliberate and considered opinion when the play came to be acted. But apart from this adventitious interest, the commissioning by a prominent manager of a poetical play from a young writer of very recent distinction, as yet untried in the field of drama, is a notable act of enterprise, encouraging to those who hope for the advancement of the English stage. One has to go back to Macready and Browning for a like instance.

Here, of course, we are concerned with Paolo and Francesca primarily as literature. Its fitness for the stage cannot be confidently or fairly gauged without the test of performance. Yet it cannot be merely excluded. The divorce between "poetical drama" and "acting drama" has wrought harm alike to stage and drama itself. One may have plays, like Browning's, based on a convention which eschews the stage, because it eschews action as the main interest. But the true poetical drama has no such opposition to stage requirements. On the contrary, the first necessity of a good poetical play is to be a good acting-play. So the Elizabethans understood their art, and their plays are the greater for it. Mr. Phillips has honestly accepted this cardinal law, and would be the first to ask that his play should be judged as a play first, and a poem second. Nay, in the greatest dramas there is neither first nor second: play and poem are an integral whole, and the poetry is but the play in blossom. The stage-necessity which weaker dramatists lament becomes life-giving law to the poem.

Yet it is needful to make much allowance for Mr. Phillips on this score, and we shall endeavour to do so. He has not to face the stage of Shakespeare, but a stage with new requirements, imposing a new law on the poet. And that law has to be ascertained. The modern stage is intolerant of long speeches, of anything which defers the swiftness of the action. In many acting-plays the written part is a mere skeleton, left for the actor to fill in by his performance. And he is apt to prefer it so. A modern poet must take account of this, to a due extent, and endeavour to create an art adapted to it. Yet it has this grave drawback: it cramps the full and subtle development of character. Modern scenic conditions, again, limit the poet, who must contrive to make few scenes suffice for each act. With these and many other difficulties it is clear that Mr. Phillips has thoughtfully and courageously grappled. It is equally clear that he has not escaped some of their disadvantages.

Making all allowances, then, Mr. Phillips seems to us to have produced a play of much beauty, of frequent power; a play which deserves admiration and respectful study, as it will certainly obtain them. Yet—at any rate, judged in the closet—it does not fulfil all our expectations from this promising young poet. Perhaps that was hardly to be expected. There seems something lacking. And that something is movement. Whether the stage would supply what appears lacking in the study is an interesting question to which we may hope for a practical answer. It is not that Mr. Phillips wastes time in speeches. Each act, taken on its own merits, is animated enough. But during a considerable portion of the play there seems to us a lack of developing action, incident arising progressively and constructively out of incident, so as to keep the attention strained upon the evolution of the story. There are carefully devised dramatic effects; but they do not evolve and culminate, and, in their turn, lead on to further culmination. They are not led up to, and there is a deficiency of consequence from them. They are isolated explosions which fire no train. Take the first scene of the third act, where Giovanni, hidden in the drug-seller's shop, hears his brother Paolo avow his love for Giovanni's wife, Francesca, and sees him go forth to end the struggle between love and fraternal duty by taking poison. It is highly dramatic and effective, leaving us looking eagerly for the development of the situation in the next scene. But there is no development. The stone rolled towards the summit falls back, the situation evaporates. Giovanni is called away without seeing his brother, and Paolo is discovered reflecting that he would like an interview with Francesca before going out of the world. So he postpones the poison, and we have the scene in which the lovers fall; after which he wants no more poison. It is very natural, but not dramatic. The reader feels that the poison plays no structural part in the action, and was introduced merely to provide an effective scene. Again, the second scene of the second act is an elaborate superfluity. All Mr. Phillips has to show is that Paolo, quitting Rimini with his soldiers for Florence, is unable to persist in his flight from Francesca; and ends the inward struggle by resolving to return and poison himself. There is essentially no dramatic action in this: it is a mere matter of soliloquy, explaining the following scene in the drug-shop. But it is padded out with an interlude of village-girls, and soldiers, and the parting of maidens from their fickle military lovers; neither girls nor soldiers having any connexion with the plot, and none of them appearing again. Even in the final scene there seems to us a lack of dramatic development. Giovanni's sudden hysterical outburst, coming without any previous preparation of passion on his part from the time he is discovered behind the curtain, has a jerky and spasmodic effect inappropriate to his grim soldierly character; it seems to terminate the play with an awkward and hurriedly introduced climax.

So much we feel wanting in construction. But there are fine scenes. The parting between Paolo and Francesca, before his departure from Rimini, is full of beautiful and tender passion. The scene in which Francesca softens the haughty and childless Lucrezia reaches a very high level indeed, such as justifies great hopes for Mr. Phillips; and the famous fall of the two lovers is enlarged (so to speak) from Dante's great sketch with a delicate, sweet, and reticent prudence that could not well be bettered. Finally, the concluding scene (in spite of the blemish we have noted) is full of power, and reaches a really dramatic thrill at the moment when Giovanni is discovered behind the curtain. There should be great stage possibilities in this.

In character-drawing Mr. Phillips does not show himself strong. His best achievement is the childless Lucrezia. All the speeches put in her mouth are dramatically strong, and, poetically, among the best things in the play. His poetic execution is unexpectedly uneven. Evidently the ordinary give-and-take of dramatic dialogue hampers him. Something must be allowed, too, for the fear of over-poetising his speeches—the wish to keep them clear and intelligible to a London theatrical audience. He has certainly erred on the side of discretion in this difficult matter. But we fancy that dramatic dialogue itself is at present rather crippling to Mr. Phillips's poetical gift. The blank verse in the level passages often lacks vitality and movement. When he writes:

Paolo, this is an ill
Beginning to our marriage, and I loathe
That you should put me off, it needs only to be printed without a break to appear what it is—plain prose. That unlucky phrase, "put me off," redolent of the modern drawing-room, completes the effect. Of course, this is an extreme example. Still, Mr. Phillips does not really find his feet in this blank verse until he finds his wings—if we may be excused such an Hibernicism. In other words, he needs impassioned dialogue or monologue, which gives him lyrical or semi-lyrical opportunity, in order to display his poetic mastery. Then we have the Stephen Phillips that we know:

Ah! can you think it is not sweet to breathe
The delicate air and flowery sigh of you,
The stealing May and mystery of your spirit?

That is poetry such as has been long unheard on our stage. "This is the stillest time of night or day," says Francesca's maid in the hour before dawn. "Know you why?" answers Francesca.

Now
Day in a breathless passion kisses night,
And neither speaks.

A lovely utterance, worthily prelude to the scene of the fatal kiss which Dante has made immortal. Or, in another kind, take the passionate speech of the barren Lucrezia:

Have I not in my thought trained little feet
To venture, and taught little lips to move
Until they shaped the wonder of a word?
I am long practised. O those children, mine!
Mine, doubly mine; and yet I cannot touch them.
I cannot see them, hear them—does great God
Expect I shall clasp air and kiss the wind
For ever? And the budding cometh on,
The burgeoning, the cruel flowering:
At night the quickening splash of rain, at dawn
That muffled call of babes how like to birds;
And I amid these sights and sounds must starve—
I with so much to give, perish of thrift!
Omitted by His casual dew!

The burning beauty of this speech is truly dramatic, and discloses in every line the poet of "Marpessa." We wish the splendid scene between Lucrezia and Francesca were not too long for quotation. Whatever Lucrezia speaks has this strong poetic fervour. And wherever, indeed, the conditions of the dialogue really give Mr. Phillips an opportunity for emotion, he seizes it with the same sureness of elevation. In impassioned lyricism he is never found wanting. The approach of a strong situation wakens his blank verse like a trumpet; it is in the level passages only that it sleeps. We must needs quote the antiphony of the two lovers at the close:

PAOLO. O face immured beside a fairy sea,
That leaned down at dead midnight to be kissed!
O beauty folded up in forests old!
Thou wast the lovely quest of Arthur's knights —
FRANC. Thy armour glimmered in a gloom of green.
PAOLO. Did I not sing to thee in Babylon?
FRANC. Or did we set a sail in Carthage Bay?
PAOLO. Were thine eyes strange?
FRANC. Did I not know thy voice?
All ghostly grew the sun, unreal the air,
Then when we kissed.

To hear that, and much more like that, on the stage will be a glorious anticipation with many of us, for this play has strength, passion, and beauty to spare. Its faults of structure are faults which experience will mend. The same may be said of its partial inequalities of execution; and whether this play succeed or not, if a poetical play can succeed on the modern stage, we believe Mr. Phillips is capable of writing it. We hesitate to think Paolo and Francesca quite a success, so far as can be judged off the stage. But it is remarkable work. And the last scene, take it all in all, has an imaginative strength which lives in the memory. It might save a weaker play. We do not think Mr. Phillips at his best as a dramatist. But that he has dramatic stuff in him he clearly shows, and the stage may justify what fails to hold us in reading.

Two Men's Memories.

Recollections, 1832 to 1886. By the Right Hon. Sir Algernon West, K.C.B. 2 vols. (Smith, Elder. 21s.)

That Reminds Me. By Sir Edward Russell. (Unwin.)

SIR ALGERNON WEST was born in 1832, and Sir Edward Russell in 1834. Both men have lived the political life, and the same events and the same social changes have been witnessed by them and have moulded their opinions and careers. But their "reminiscences" are as different as the standpoints from which they have surveyed the arena. Sir Algernon West is the typical permanent official, snugly berthed in Government offices, surveying life from a window in Whitehall, and receiving the world on a Turkey carpet. Sir Edward Russell is the typical journalist, bustling, investigating, and wielding the sudden potencies of the Press; at home in a mob, yet arriving often on the Turkey carpets of the ruling classes. As are the men so are their books. Sir Algernon West's reminiscences hardly touch the man in the street; Sir Edward Russell's are for everybody; yet they, too, will find and exclude readers. One comparison may be made at once. The secretary easily beats the journalist in discretion. There are no indiscretions in Sir Algernon West's pages; there are several in Sir Edward Russell's. You have only to compare Sir Algernon West's gentle reference to the breakdown of Lord Randolph Churchill with Sir Edward Russell's coarse particularity to appreciate this difference. We do not give the double quotation, because we have no wish to multiply pain. Again, Sir Edward Russell's account of the doubts which beset the completion of Mr. Onslow Ford's famous statue of Shelley, nude and drowned, is a passage which Sir Algernon West would blush to write, and, probably, to read. It is an unnecessary record of Mrs. Grundy's emotions. But both books are readable. How could it be otherwise?

One kind of interest need never be absent from the reminiscences of a man well advanced in years—the interest of mere long-reaching memories. Sir Algernon West's drawing-room and bureaucratic chit-chat is relieved by passages of this kind. Thus, Sir Algernon can remember seeing poor debtors looking through the bars of Dover Castle and begging alms; he can remember the time when chained lunatics were shown for twopence; he has seen the Foot Guards wearing white duck trousers, cross-belts, and large white cotton epaulettes; he has stood beneath the rowdy hustings in Covent Garden; he recalls the time when hosts sent their smoking guests across the yard into the harness room, after dinner, to enjoy the all but forbidden weed; he remembers the starting of Punch as if it were yesterday. But there are more bewildering passages than these. Invited to the salon of the Misses Berry, in Curzon-street, young West met the lady who, Thackeray says, "had been asked in marriage by Horace Walpole, who himself had been patted on the head by George I. This lady had knocked at Dr. Johnson's door, had been intimate with Fox, the beautiful Georgiana Duchess of Devonshire, and that brilliant Whig society of the reign of George III.; had known the Duchess of Queensberry, the patroness of Gay and Prior, the admired young beauty of the reign of Queen Anne." A Socialist, if he be honest, must admit that aged aristocrats remember what is worth remembering.

It is odd, too, what small matters a book like this will clear up. Only the other day the present writer was wondering whence came those two delicate stags which decorate the pillars of the Albert Gate. Sir Algernon remembers them in front of Lady William Gordon's ice-house attached to her residence in the Green Park, when the Green Park contained this mansion and also a large reservoir at its north-east corner.

We cannot accuse Sir Algernon West of having written a dull page; but his natural readers will be found only in the politest circles. There is a power of writing like this: "I often dined with Alfred Buckley at his aunt's, Mrs. Lane Fox . . . Marochetti, whom I often met at Sir John Leslie's house at dinner. . . . It was at Lady Sydney's hospitable table in Cleveland-square that I gained my first experience of what was then called diner à la Russe. . . . I was sometimes at Lady William Russell's house in South Audley-square. She had broken her leg and was on her sofa, but this did not dull her wit." There is so much dining, and Turkey carpet, that we are grateful for every foil. Once when Lord Sydney, an ideal aristocrat, went to a Mansion House dinner, the Lord Mayor, who bore the same name, came up to him and said affably: "Oddly enough, my lord, there are three of us 'ere to-night; there's me, and you, and Sidney 'Erbert." One likes, too, the story of Lord Malmesbury, who, when driving up the Mall to a Drawing Room, saw some wild ducks flying from St. James's water to the Serpentine. Accustomed to shoot with his coachman in the country, he could not resist letting down the window and shouting to that bewigged functionary, "John, John, ducks over!" Of isolated stories there are not a few worth quoting. Bobsy Meade of the Colonial Office was anxious to have executions in Malta carried out more humanely. So he consulted Marwood. Marwood strongly advised the "long drop," and explained his own process thus: "There was Mr. Peace, a small man; I gave him a six-foot drop, and I assure you, sir, he passed hoff like a summer heve." Of course Mr. Gladstone's weighty personality and affairs lend solidity to a book written by his trusted private secretary. But Sir Algernon West's opinion of Mr. Gladstone, that he was "probably the greatest man who ever lived," makes us flee the subject.

Sir Edward Russell's volume with the colloquial title is scarcely autobiographical; it is a budget of objective memories jotted down by "a working newspaper editor." Mr. Gladstone's name meets us more frequently than any other. But Sir Edward Russell's range is wide. He analyses John Bright's oratory, and describes Corbett, the pugilist, in training at San Francisco; he defines the Lord Dunderreary stammer, and relates the burning of the Liverpool landing stage; he lays down the proposition that "there is less sneering in the United States than anywhere else," and he quotes Maeterlinck on "Goodness for its Own Sake." The reader soon learns to expect all things in these pages of stories with little headings like "Of Mr. Childers," "Of John Wesley on Tour," "Of Words that Disappear Across the Atlantic," "Of Mr. Justice Hawkins on the Stage," and so on. Here, again, there are no dull, though, as we have said, there are some unkind pages. We will quote a capital appreciation of Dr. Parker, and a question which we hope that fine preacher can answer in the affirmative:

He secretes originality as naturally as breathing, and having no mauvaise honte, and no doubts of himself, says and does things which would be impossible to other men. It is a commonplace of conversation that if there is a vein of something else in the always striking and piquant and colossal preacher of the City Temple, there is undoubtedly genius. Is the following true? Reading from one of the Epistles in his pulpit, Dr. Parker came to a place in which St. Paul speaks of one person as dear and another as most dear, or makes some such distinction. Dr. Parker looked up from his Bible, paused, and then in his most sententious manner said, "There would be an unpleasantness in that Church." Another pause, and long, solemn nodding of the head: "There would be a huff." Another pause, and more sage noddings: "Shall I show you what a huff is?" Then the doctor turned right round, showing his back to the congregation. And in every fold of his gown, every line of his head, every finesse of his attitude, this consummate actor conveyed the idea of huff to his startled audience.

Of the two classes into which the best stories can be divided—those which have intellectual point, and those which have descriptive vitality—the second is excellently represented by this tale of the City Temple. Talking of stories, one is impressed by Sir Edward Russell's tribute to A. K. H. B. as a story-teller. He says:

I once lunched with Dr. Boyd at the house of a St. Andrew's professor, and I came to the conclusion that he was almost, if not quite, the greatest raconteur I had ever known . . . I testify that I had not heard before a single one of the excellent stories that he told, and I admired them, not only because I did not find a "chestnut" among them, but because they had a quality of responsibility, which is rare in the stories of raconteurs. He had an eye for everything—not so good an eye for cynicism (which bulks so largely in table-stories) as for other things, but still an eye for cynicism, as for other things. But what you felt was that, in all the tales, no one was given away more than he ought to be, and that every narration or reminiscence was in due relation to the proportions of the characters concerned.

That is good criticism. There is plenty of such within these blue covers, though, to be sure, a writer who says that cynicism "bulks largely" in table-stories illustrates the—alas!—wearing action of journalism on style.

Tanagra.

Greek Terra-Cotta Statuettes. By Marcus B. Huish. (Murray. 16s.)

THE Greek figurines have been familiar to archaeologists since the discoveries at Tanagra a quarter of a century ago, and have already given rise to a considerable literature in Germany and France, including the magnificent volumes on La Necropole de Myrina, by MM. Pottier and Solomon Reinach. But the present treatise, based upon a thorough study of the Continental monographs and periodicals, is the first in which an adequate account of the subject has been put before the English reader. Mr. Huish is, perhaps, a collector rather than a researcher. His treatment of the archaeological problems raised by the figurines lacks something of the lucid, orderly, and scientific method so characteristic of the best French work. Nevertheless, it is a full and useful collection of data, and should attract many students to this most fascinating branch of inquiry. And for the well-chosen and reproduced illustrations we have nothing but praise. These are about a hundred and twenty in number, mainly taken from the British Museum, the Louvre, the Ionides, and the Salting collections; and they range well over every period from the archaic to the decadent.

Nothing can be more charming, and nothing more significant of the widespread artistic feeling of ancient Greece, than these statuettes. Things of beauty as they are, they are not the workmanship of great artists, only of common potters, craftsmen of no exalted order, whom the Greek writers speak of somewhat contemptuously as koroplastai, "makers of dolls." They were turned out, on a commercial scale, either by hand or from moulds, and were probably sold from trays at the gates of cemeteries and temple precincts. Their motives were, no doubt, borrowed, as Mr. Huish points out, from more ambitious works of sculpture and painting. And yet how utterly free they are from all the qualities which we associate with modern commercial design! Look at "The Three Graces," or "The Conversation at the Tomb," in the South Kensington Museum; or Mr. Ionides' "Aphrodite and Eros"; or Mr. Huish's own "Seated Lady": you would vow them the masterpieces of a lifetime, designed to grace a king's cabinet.

The origin and use to which such statuettes were put has greatly puzzled the archaeologists. It is thought unlikely that they were intended merely for household decoration, for the modern taste for bric-à-brac was not one which the Greeks shared. Some of them were doubtless ex votis deposited at temples; others were possibly dolls for children; but the majority of them are found in tombs, and evidently had some definite connexion with the sepulchral ritual. Unfortunately the Tanagra tombs were despoiled of their contents before the days of scientific archaeology, and the nature of the deposits must, therefore, be matter of conjecture. The second great find, however, which took place at Myrina, in Asia Minor, was the outcome of deliberate exploration, and the records show, firstly, that only some seven per cent. of the five thousand tombs examined contained figurines at all; and, secondly, that nearly all the figurines were broken. Judging from the way in which the pieces lay, the heads had been deliberately broken from the bodies by bystanding mourners, and the two fragments thrown, one with each hand, into the tomb. It also became evident that the character of the figurines bore some relation to the age and sex of the corpse:

In that of a woman were found nothing but statuettes of women and of such divinities as Aphrodite, Eros, Demeter, and Nike. In that of a man would be found, in practically equal proportions, statuettes of either sex, but among those of divinities would be Dionysos, Heracles, and Atys. In those of children the large number of representations of Eros or of children would be unmistakable, but there would be also those of men and women. In addition to this, the statuettes often clearly agreed in age with that of the child, and the toys and the games were probably those which it had enjoyed during life.

The favourite theory is that this use of figurines is a survival from a primitive type of civilisation, and that they represent the slaves and women slain, according to a widely spread custom, for the use of the dead in the shadowy land. This view is to some extent supported by the fact that the tombs also contained bottles, plates and saucers to hold food, the mirrors, strigils, ointment-boxes and jewels of women, and a copper coin between the teeth of the corpse to pay his fare over Styx. On the other hand, it seems impossible upon this theory to understand why nearly all the most primitive and archaic types of figurine should represent divinities. If, however, we look upon the figurines as personal amulets buried with the dead, then why should they be broken? We do not find that Mr. Huish or anyone else has quite solved the problem. The third and late fourth century figurines of Tanagra, in Boeotia, show distinctly later phases of development than those of Myrina. The old types are subtly transformed from divinity to humanity.

The goddess tranquilly seated on her throne has practically disappeared, except in rare cases, where one encounters Kourotrophos seated; but even then the infant is shown at the breast, a human and natural motive which ancient Greek Art never presumed to introduce. The same applies to standing figures, in which the goddess entirely disappears. Aphrodite, as the special goddess of beauty, more and more usurps the place of the ancient funerary deity. Artemis is still met with occasionally, but no additions are made to the funerary rôle. Demeter and Persephone take a fresh shape. They now become two young and gracious girls, of which one is veiled and has a certain aspect of austerity, the other is bathed in sweetness; they either hold apples or flowers. Demeter, too, has usually Eros as her attendants. Grotesques were not much the mode, and the grosser forms are laid completely aside, but tradition permits Seilenos, whom wine makes festive and malicious, to be represented in that rôle. Among figures of old women the Tanagræans had a special predilection for one occupied with the duties of a nurse. The pedagogue with his pupils also allows of burlesque treatment. Among the figures carrying an offering to the dead the motive of the hydria is frequently used, and a new creation appears in the girl who carries a libation in the funereal lecythos. Those with castanets or tambourines are survivals of tradition, and the goddesses who used to carry flowers or apples in their hands are transformed into girls with baskets of flowers or fruit. Even the children, who formerly carried offerings, are now turned into boys with every kind of object which will furnish them with amusement. The youths, with strigils, or lightly armed; the girls, with their favourite pet—a dove or a hare—or playing with a ball, or with knuckle-bones—all have had their divine prototypes; but these are lost, and they have become nothing more than ordinary individuals.

Finally, with the mysteries yet another series of motives comes in, and we find, presumably from tombs of the initiate, figurines bearing symbols, Dionysiac masks, crowns of ivy and the like, which seem to designate participation in those cults by which the later Greek mind attempted to gloss over for itself the certainty of death with hints and whispers of immortality.

Lewis Carrolliana.

The Lewis Carroll Picture Book. Edited by S. Dodgson Collingwood. (Unwin. 6s.)

ONE lays aside this book more than ever impressed with the uncanny ingenuity of Lewis Carroll's brain. To the ordinary man it is given to see the familiar side of a thing: Lewis Carroll was always more concerned with the other. Intellectually he resembles that juggler who, needing a light, first takes a match in his hand and then so throws up the match-box that in its fall its side will rub against the match's head and ignite it. To change the metaphor, where ordinary men have brains which prefer hard ground, Lewis Carroll's walked the tight-rope.

This book—which, by the way, has much less right to be called The Lewis Carroll Picture Book than The Lewis Carroll Scrap Book—is filled with testimonies to the bewildering mental agility of the author of Alice in Wonderland and Symbolic Logic. The fact that his genius for absurdity—for what Mr. Collingwood happily calls splendid fits of midsummer madness—and his scrupulously thoughtful reverence for children's happiness are represented too, makes this book, although it is a mere jumble and contains no sustained effort of its author, a more complete personification of the complete Lewis Carroll than anything else to which his name is joined.

When only a small boy he could write like this, in the family magazine, "The Rectory Umbrella":

Half of the world, or nearly so, is always in the light of the sun: as the world turns round, this hemisphere of light shifts round too, and passes over each part of it in succession.

Supposing on Tuesday, it is morning at London; in another hour it would be Tuesday morning at the West of England; if the whole world were land we might go on tracing Tuesday morning, Tuesday morning all the way round, till in twenty-four hours we get to London again. But we know that at London twenty-four hours after Tuesday morning it is Wednesday morning. Where, then, in its passage round the earth, does the day change its name? where does it lose its identity?

Practically there is no difficulty in it, because a great part of its journey is over water, and what it does out at sea no one can tell; and, besides, there are so many different languages that it would be hopeless to attempt to trace the name of any one day all round. But is the case inconceivable that the same land and the same language should continue all round the world? I cannot see that it is: in that case either there would be no distinction at all between each successive day, and so week, month, &c., so that we should have to say, "The Battle of Waterloo happened to-day, about two million hours ago," or some line would have to be fixed where the change should take place, so that the inhabitant of one house would wake and say, "Heigh-ho, Tuesday morning!" and the inhabitant of the next (over the line), a few miles to the west, would wake a few minutes afterwards and say, "Heigh-ho, Wednesday morning!"

We find the same boy, a little later, offering "Hints on Etiquette." Here are two:

In proceeding to the dining-room, the gentleman gives one arm to the lady he escorts—it is unusual to offer both.

Proposing the health of the boy in buttons immediately on the removal of the cloth is a custom springing from regard to his tender years, rather than from a strict adherence to the rules of etiquette.

And, to complete the examples from boyhood or youth, here is a passage from the undergraduate to his brother and sister:

My one pupil has begun his work with me, and I will give you a description how the lecture is conducted. It is the most important point, you know, that the tutor should be dignified and at a distance from the pupil, and that the pupil should be as much as possible degraded.

Otherwise, you know, they are not humble enough.

So I sit at the further end of the room; outside the door (which is shut) sits the scout; outside the outer door (also shut) sits the sub-scout; half-way downstairs sits the sub-sub-scout; and down in the yard sits the pupil.

The questions are shouted from one to the other, and the answers come back in the same way—it is rather confusing till you are well used to it. The lecture goes on something like this:

TUTOR. What is twice three?

SCOUT. What's a rice tree?

SUB-SCOUT. When is ice free?

SUB-SUB-SCOUT. What's a nice fee?

PUPIL (timidly). Half a guinea!

SUB-SUB-SCOUT. Can't forge any!

SUB-SCOUT. Ho for Jinny!

SCOUT. Don't be a ninny!

TUTOR (looks offended, but tries another question). Divide a hundred by twelve!

SCOUT. Provide wonderful bells!

SUB-SCOUT. Go ride under it yourself!

SUB-SUB-SCOUT. Deride the dunder-headed elf!

PUPIL (surprised). Who do you mean?

SUB-SUB-SCOUT. Doings between!

SUB-SCOUT. Blue is the screen!

SCOUT. Soup-tureen!

And so the lecture proceeds.

Such is Life.

Of the "Notes by an Oxford Chiel," which form an interesting chapter of this book, much has already been said in the ACADEMY. But there is an account of a little girl's visit to Oxford which is so charming that we should like to quote it entire. It is, however, so long that we must confine ourselves to one extract:

On Friday morning (after taking her medicine very amiably), went with the A.A.M. (who would go with her, though she told him over and over she would rather be alone) to the gardens of Worcester College (built in 1714), where they didn't see the swans (who ought to have been on the lake) nor the hippopotamus (who ought not to have been walking about among the flowers, gathering honey like a busy bee).

After breakfast Isa helped the A.A.M. to pack his luggage, because he thought he would go away, he didn't know where, some day, he didn't know when—so she put a lot of things, she didn't know what, into boxes, she didn't know which.

After dinner they went to St. John's College (built in 1555), and admired the large lawn, where more than 150 ladies, dressed in robes of gold and silver, were not walking about.

Then they saw the Chapel of Keble College (built in 1870) and then the New Museum, where Isa quite lost her heart to a charming stuffed Gorilla that smiled on her from a glass case. The Museum was finished in 1860. The most curious thing they saw there was a "Walking Leaf," a kind of insect that looks exactly like a withered leaf.

Then they went to New College (built in 1386), and saw, close to the entrance, a "skew" arch (going slantwise through the wall), one of the first ever built in England. After seeing the gardens, they returned to Ch. Ch. (Parts of the old City walls run round the gardens of New College; and you may still see some of the old narrow slits through which the defenders could shoot arrows at the attacking army, who could hardly succeed in shooting through them from the outside.)

They had tea with Mrs. Paget, wife of Dr. Paget, one of the Canons of Ch. Ch. Then, after a sorrowful evening, Isa went to bed, and dreamed she was buzzing about among the flowers with the dear Gorilla; but there wasn't any honey in them—only slices of bread-and-butter and multiplication-tables.

Finally, we may quote one of the mathematical curiosities which Lewis Carroll occasionally discovered:

Put down any number of pounds not more than twelve, any number of shillings under twenty, and any number of pence under twelve. Under the pounds put the number of pence, under the shillings the number of shillings, and under the pence the number of pounds, thus reversing the line.

Subtract.

Reverse the line again.

Add.

Answer, £12 18s. 11d., whatever numbers may have been selected.

We fancy, however, that Mr. Collingwood has not stated the case quite fully enough. For instance, he should have inserted a clause to bar the same figure being chosen for pounds, shillings, and pence, as £10 10s. 10d., which leads nowhere, and also to stipulate that the pence figure must not be greater than the pounds figure, as £10 10s. 11d., which also leads nowhere.

The book is exceedingly readable, and, to the mathematical mind, suggestive. But the non-mathematically-minded reader may occasionally express a sigh of thankfulness that Lewis Carroll was an exception and not the rule.

The Game of Talk.

Conversational Openings. By Mrs. Hugh Bell. (Edward Arnold. 2s. 6d.)

Not all of us are compelled to write when we have nothing to write about; but every one of us is continually compelled to talk when we have nothing particular to say. And even the cleverest, when suddenly confronted with a person of unknown antecedents, pursuits, and prejudices, must often have felt, like Addison, that, though he had as it were a handsome balance at the bank, he had but a pitiful ninepence in his pocket. It is very doubtful if the art of conversation can be taught; the good talker is born, not made; and the various attempts to make him have not been very successful. Lord Chesterfield advised his son in this matter, as in others, bidding him avoid prolixity, taking people by the button, swearing, speaking ill of the clergy, and so forth. This, however, is merely negative counsel, and a man might eschew all these errors and yet be a dull companion. Mrs. Hugh Bell aims at an easier mark, and hits it true and full. She does not profess to teach us to talk brilliantly, only to avoid that deadly silence during which two stranger souls, seated side by side at a dinner party grope blindly for a point of contact. She does not teach us how to play the game out, but only how to begin it, and the beginning is the most difficult part.

Now, as Mrs. Bell plainly sees, the number of possible openings is limited. It would sound very abrupt if you said as you dropped into your seat, "How very grey St. Paul's used to be!" The openings then can be tabulated. They are not very important; but the reply should suggest the further course of the game. It should be noted that Mrs. Bell adopts the terminology of chess. Black is the male, White the female. They are seated at the dinner table:

If the players are equally matched, the game ought now to be of the greatest interest. If, however, as is often the case, they are entirely unequal, the more skilful player will find any original or unconventional attack, any direct opening, quite useless. By the direct opening I mean a plunge at once into a discussion of the personal opinions or proclivities of either of the players, instead of some general platitude. Assuming this inequality, we will suppose Black to begin.

SOUP OPENING.

Black.

White.

- |  |  |
|--|--|
| 1. Do you say drink soup, or eat soup? | 1. I really don't know—I don't think I say either.   |
| 2. What do you say, then?              | 2. I really don't know—I don't think I say anything. |

This is entirely unfavourable to Black, who will find that his scheme has been thwarted by White's want of originality, and that he will have to try something else.

Well, he may try the "bread opening." That, we imagine, is one of the commonest. "Is this your bread or mine?" asks Black. If White replies simply "Mine," the game drops again, and the point of the game is to keep the game alive. Of course Black was not in need of information, for there is always a reserve of rolls at a dinner-party. White should say, "Yours, I think; I always keep mine on my left." This gives Black the chance to reply, "Really! I always keep mine on my right." "On your right! do you? That is a sign of an original mind," exclaims White. And so a good game is in prospect. The "gourmet opening" is another which is in common use. Black hands White the menu. "Are you interested in this document?" he inquires. Now mark the reply; for it is the crucial point in the game. "Thank you" would lead nowhere. Let White retort: "Do you think women ought not to be?" and the pair float safely out on the flood-tide of a discussion upon the most interesting subject in the world. Even a remark upon the weather may lead to an interesting game—if the reply is skilful. "How very cold it has been to-day!" says Black. "Yes, indeed," replied White, "almost as cold as my native Yorkshire." It is then Black's fault if no development follows; for Yorkshire is a very big place, and everybody knows something about it.

On the whole, we are inclined to welcome Mrs. Hugh Bell's suggestion for conversational formula, which shall be recognised as such, and used universally to open the way to acquaintanceship. We have already one or two such, as she points out, such as "How do you do?" "Good-bye," "Thank you," and so on. And what an amount of thought they save! What a strain upon our invention if we had to devise a fresh form of greeting for every friend we encountered! Wherefore we have taken Mrs. Bell's conversational openings much more seriously than she takes them herself; she is, indeed, rather inclined to joke about them. We prefer to recommend them in all gravity to unimaginative diners-out. They will serve to launch the most cumbersome of us upon the shallows of talk. Whether we afterwards sink or swim must depend on ourselves.

Small Reasonablenesses.

The Decay of Sensibility. By Stephen Gwynn. (John Lane. 5s. net)

WHEN a writer reprints articles from the newspapers and magazines under titles like "Domesticity," "A Plea for Apple Dumplings," "A Theory of Talk," &c., it must be assumed that he is willing to have these articles criticised as essays. It is a bold challenge. The critic's palate is not staled in essays as it is in fiction; and he may be depended on to be fastidious. We have no wish to be unduly fastidious, but we may as well say at once that we cannot hail Mr. Gwynn's book as more than a stepping-stone to the restoration of the Essay. So many qualities of the true essayist are lacking in Mr. Gwynn—as he reveals himself in these pages. He prattles cleverly. There is any amount of safe, facetious small-thought in these papers; but there is no hidden fire, no pressure of the hand, no intimacy. Mr. Gwynn talks to you like a visitor who is the more at his ease because he remembers exactly where he left his umbrella in the hall. You are never privileged, never really valued. Mr. Gwynn hazards nothing on your discretion or your friendship; what he says to you he will say to another. His papers are the distilled talk of many drawing-rooms.

There is no surer symptom of the lack of those human and engaging qualities which make an essayist than a conscious appeal to readers who possess class prejudice and money. That the rightly-written essay will appeal to readers of this order is highly probable, but a conscious selection of such readers is fatal. Mr. Gwynn makes this mistake. He assumes that you keep a gardener. He says that "a man's self resides principally in his work or his play; if he talks of himself, it means generally that he tells you of his career in the House of Commons, or his big days on a Scotch lough." And in another place Mr. Gwynn speaks of "the class to which most readers of these lines belong." This is probably a relic of the Spectator; the retention is a slip which almost amounts to a fault of taste. The weakness goes deeper. Mr. Gwynn is too much the mere spokesman of polite, literary, slightly advanced circles; he does not fuse or transfuse what he has learnt there. An essayist should do all this. One does not want to read in an essay:

I have heard a lady suggest (and it seemed an admirable idea) that one of the lady's clubs should try the experiment of organising a large crèche with a competent staff, where members of the club could deposit their children upon reasonable terms when they wanted to go off for a tour with their husbands.

Nor do we desire pages and pages of small reasonableness like this:

Generally speaking, no one cares to shoot a thing sitting, because anybody could hit it; the conditions in the contest between man and beast are too unequal.

The only show of solidity in Mr. Gwynn's book is derived from the first essay, which is his well-known (and justly resented) attack on Jane Austen. Mr. Gwynn says he does not wish to meet Miss Austen in Paradise (which will surely prolong his own stay in Purgatory); and he thinks she must have been a most unlovable woman (which notoriously she was not); and he "cannot away with" her prudent Elinore, her sententious Edmunds and Edwards, her vacillating Anne Elliot. If he went on to establish these positions he would have shown more gallantry to Miss Austen and more courage to his readers, but Mr. Gwynn presently tells us that what he really dislikes in Jane Austen's novels is the swooning propensities of her heroines; their absurd "sensibility," their ever-ready tears and sobs, and their dependence on salts and lavender-water. "The modern young woman," we are reminded, "does not swoon promiscuously. If she falls off her bicycle she may get concussion of the brain, just like her brother on the football field; if she gets an unusually severe blow on the nose with a hockey-stick she may faint, as she might under a surgical operation; but she does not faint from sheer emotion." She does not, and therefore Mr. Gwynn—who makes no drawing-room mistakes—"cannot away with" Miss Austen's heroines. Swoon is a rather comic word, and Mr. Gwynn achieves some tentative fun by throwing it about his pages. But it is all a question of pitch or key. The swooning habits of the Austen lot of girls are no more essential to them than their poke bonnets. The heart of woman remains the same, though the point at which her eyes overflow alters with time and training. Mr. Gwynn might as reasonably call on us to revise our estimate of Dumas because his men were afflicted with a sensibility which led them to draw their rapiers in the moonlight, when they should have been content to gird at each other in the papers.

We do not for an instant deny Mr. Gwynn a welcome into the band of possible essayists. He has wit and learning and a pretty style. By the way, some of his London sketches, particularly "Nightfall in Kensington-gardens," are very good. But into these, as into all his essays, Mr. Gwynn must put more work, more patience, and more of his heart's blood.

A Drawing Room Playwright.

Polite Farces. By E. A. Bennett. (Lamley & Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

"DUMAS père," Mr. Bennett remarks in his prefatory note, "once said that all he needed was 'four trestles, four boards, two actors, and a passion.' For myself, I have dispensed with the trestles, the boards, and the passion, since none of these things is suitable for a drawing room." Instead of the passion he gives us contrétemps, embarrassments, which the three or four self-conscious, humorous persons of these farces play with whimsically for half-an-hour and then forget. In "The Stepmother," a famous woman novelist is in perplexity partly because her stepson has made love to her typist, and has, therefore, had to be sent away, partly because a doctor living in the flat below has proposed to her and is coming for his answer at noon, and partly because she suspects that it is he who wrote an article attacking her use of medicine in her novels. In "A Good Woman" a previous and not absolutely rejected lover turns up an hour before it is time for his lady to start for the registry office to be married to his successor, and the case has to be argued out between the three of them. In "A Question of Sex" an uncle has promised £10,000 to his nephew's first child if it is a boy. It happens to be a girl, and the gift has still to be extracted from the unwilling relative. There certainly are no passions here, but the substitute is agreeable enough, and Mr. Bennett has worked out his little plays with a very acceptable lightness and dexterity. If now and then we are reminded of "The Importance of Being Earnest" and "You Never Can Tell," it is less, we fancy, because Mr. Bennett has gone to Mr. Wilde and Mr. Shaw of set purpose than because at the present moment a writer of farcical comedy who chooses his puppets from a certain section of society must naturally make them humorously ready to give themselves away and to avoid taking anything seriously. That pose is in the air, and an observant critic of his kind, such as Mr. Bennett is, cannot neglect it.

Mr. Bennett's plays, as we have indicated, are three in number: "The Stepmother," "A Good Woman," and "A Question of Sex," and the order in which we have placed them—the same order that they have in the book—indicates their respective merit. "The Stepmother" is the best alike in humour and in technique, partly because Mr. Bennett is there dealing with matters which he knows as well as anyone: Cora Prout, the stepmother in question, being a successful novelist; Christine Feversham, her typist, a journalist in a small way; Adrian Prout, Mrs. Prout's stepson, a journalist too—and Mr. Bennett himself a novelist, a journalist, and the author of Journalism for Women. This is how the play begins:

CHRISTINE. Good morning, Mrs. Prout. I'm afraid you are still sleeping badly.

MRS. PROUT. Do I look it, girl?

CHRISTINE. You don't specially look it, Mrs. Prout. But I observe. You are my third novelist, and they have all taught me to observe. Before I took up novelists I was with a member of Parliament, and he never observed anything except five-line whips.

MRS. PROUT. Really! Five-line whips! Oblige me by putting that down in Notebook No. 2. There will be an M.P. in that wretched thirty-thousand word thing I've promised for the Christmas number of the New York Surpriser, and it might be useful. I might even make an epigram out of it.

We quote another passage:

CHRISTINE. Which will you do, Mrs. Prout? [Consulting a diary of engagements.] There's the short story for the Illustrated Monthly, six thousand, promised for next Saturday. There's the article on "Women's Diversions" for the British Review—they wrote for that yesterday. There's the serial that begins in the Sunday Daily Sentinel in September—you've only done half the first instalment of that. And, of course, there's Heart Ache.

MRS. PROUT. I think I'll go on with Heart Ache. I feel it coming. I'll do the short story for the Illustrated to-morrow. Where had I got to?

CHRISTINE. [Choosing the correct notebook, reads] "The inanimate form of the patient lay like marble on the marble slab of the operating-table. 'The sponge, Nurse,' said the doctor; 'where is it?'" That's where you'd got to.

MRS. PROUT. Yes. I remember. New line. "Isabel gazed at him imperturbably." New line. Quote-marks. "I fear, Doctor," she remarked, "that in a moment of forgetfulness you have sewn it up in our poor patient." New line. Quote-marks. "'Damn!'" said the doctor, "so I have." Rather good, that, Christine, eh? [Christine writes in shorthand.]

CHRISTINE. Oh, Mrs. Prout, I think it's beautiful. So staccato and crisp.

This gives the note of the piece. Mr. Bennett keeps steadily on this plane of raillery, with now and then a comic idea standing out, as in the following comment of Christine during a passage of arms between the returned stepson and his stepmother:

ADRIAN. Need I defend myself, mamma? Consider what you had done to me. You had devastated my young heart, which was just unfolding to its first passion. You had blighted the springtime of the exquisite creature [looking at Christine, who is moved by the feeling in his tones—the exquisite creature who was dearer to me than all the world. In place of the luxury of my late father's house you offered me—the street. . . .

CHRISTINE. Yes . . . and Gower-street.

We can recommend Mr. Bennett's plays as being excellently adapted for their purpose. If only tolerably acted, the audience will still have a more stimulating time than forty-nine out of fifty of the ordinary drawing-room farces can offer them.

The Gospel of the Witches.

Aradia; or, The Gospel of the Witches. By Charles G. Leland. (Nutt.)

THE survivals of pre-Christian observance and belief in the traditions of witchcraft are a happy hunting-ground for the historian of culture. The male divinity of occult worship generally takes form, under the influence of current theology, as Satan or Lucifer; but side by side with him may often be traced a female being, the ancient mother goddess of the Aryan peoples. She has, as Latin myth knew, a threefold aspect—heavenly as the moon, earthly as mother earth herself, infernal as Hecate. In Italy the witches still know her by her Roman name of Diana, and many tremendous charms are wrought in her power. Fragments, however, from other than Aryan sources have been woven into the occult circle; amulets and rites probably of still earlier European origin, Etruscan, Siluric, Iberic; names and notions certainly of Talmudic or other Oriental provenance. Thus Diana has a doublet in the spirit Herodias, who is sometimes substituted for her, sometimes treated as her daughter. She is generally supposed to be derived from that daughter of Salome whose connexion with the murder of St. John the Baptist impressed the mediæval imagination, and the fact that the male divinity is occasionally called Herodes seems to bear this out. Mr. Leland, however, would find in her another Herodias, who is the same as Lilith, the first wife, according to Talmudic tradition, of Adam. Wherever she came from, she plays a considerable part in the legends and traditions of the Italian witches or streghe (the strigas or strias of Latin writers), and notably in the curious document which Mr. Leland now for the first time publishes. This was discovered for him near Siena by one Maddalena, herself a votary of la vecchia religione, whom he employs as a collector of folklore. It goes by the name of the Vangelo, or Gospel of the Witches, and consists partly of charms of a not uncommon type, partly of legends embodying a kind of witch mythology. First comes a story of how Diana and Lucifer had a daughter Aradia, and how, seeing the oppression of the poor by the rich, they sent Aradia to earth to teach witchcraft to men and spread the cult of her mother. Then follows a ritual for a witches' supper, or sabbat, with "conjurations" for the meal and salt, out of which are to be made crescent-shaped cakes whereby to conjure Diana herself. Then a story of "How Diana made the Stars and the Rain"; then charms for stone amulets, for winning love, for nullifying the effect of the gift of a lemon stuck full of pins, for success at market, for a good vintage, and the like. Finally, two other myths, one of which, "Tana and Endamone," is an obvious variant of the "Diana and Endymion" of classical lore.

The interest of the document—of which, of course, we assume the genuineness—from the folklore point of view, is apparent. What is a little surprising is to find that it is mainly written in verse, and in verse by no means devoid of poetical qualities. Here, for instance, is a fragment from the "Conjuration of Salt" in Mr. Leland's very fairly close rendering:

I conjure thee, O Meal!
Who art indeed our body, since without thee
We could not live, thou who (at first as seed)
Before becoming flower went in the earth,
Where all deep secrets hide, and then when ground
Didst dance like dust in the wind, and yet meanwhile Didst bear with thee in fitting secrets strange!

And yet erewhile, when thou wert in the ear,
Even as a (golden) glittering rain, even then
The fireflies came to cast on thee their light
And aid thy growth, because without their help
Thou couldst not grow nor beautiful become;
Therefore thou dost belong unto the race
Of witches or of fairies, and because
The fireflies do belong unto the sun.

This is certainly not the style of the ordinary grimoire, and if a strega wrote it she must have been far more literate than the members of her confraternity outside Italy generally are. In any case, however old a tradition it may represent, the Vangelo in its present form must be a comparatively modern remaniement. Perhaps some competent scholar could put an approximate date to the Italian text?

"Gossip About Jane."

Jane Austen: Her Contemporaries and Herself. By Walter Herries Pollock. (Longmans.)

BETWIXT "Chatter about Harriet" and "Gossip about Jane" a wide gulf is set. Of the first we can hardly have too little, of the other we do not care how much is supplied, provided that it is eulogistic and genial. Not that there is anything new to say; but every gossip can say it afresh, in his own way, and where he has such reverence for Miss Austen and such a passion for accuracy as Mr. Pollock possesses, one may easily acquire from his pages, if not new facts, at any rate new points of view, and perhaps a better sense of the unity of Miss Austen's work. For those who esteem all appreciative writing about the six novels the saddest thing in the whole matter is Macaulay's failure to write that essay on Miss Austen for which he collected material, and which he looked forward to with such eagerness. Macaulay knew the novels through and through, and he would have come to this essay so well furnished with sympathy and enthusiasm as to place it probably among his finest work. But it was not written, and all we have from its projection is the incidental criticism in the essay on Madame D'Arblay, and a number of references in his diary and letters.

We said just now that new facts about Miss Austen are not to be looked for; but three points which Mr. Pollock makes or records are new to us. He notes the circumstance that in the last chapter of Miss Burney's Cecilia Dr. Lyster remarks: "The whole of this unfortunate business has been the result of PRIDE AND PREJUDICE." Now, Miss Austen was a great reader of Fanny Burney, and her name appears as one of the subscribers to Cecilia, in 1796. Hence it may fairly be assumed, it is argued, that Dr. Lyster's phrase gave her the title of her most famous novel. Its first title was, of course, "First Impressions," and a very good title, too, so far as Elizabeth Bennet was concerned. "Pride and Prejudice" has the advantage of including and characterising Darcy too. Another of Mr. Pollock's theories is that Highbury, in Emma, is not, as some commentators have thought (in spite of the fact that it is stated to be sixteen miles from London), a Hampshire town, but may be identified with Esher, especially as Miss Austen knew Esher. Her uncle, Mr. Cooper, lived at Bookham, hard by. But the discovery which is really valuable is the copy of a letter written to Miss Charlotte Warren by Miss Caroline Austen, the niece of Jane Austen, concerning an amusing slip in Emma. Strawberries, it will be remembered, are described as being eaten from the beds of Donwell Abbey at the same time that the Abbey Mill Farm orchard was in blossom. This is the kind of slip which all novelists make now and then. The letter tells of the mischievous pleasure of Jane Austen's brother, Edward (who became Edward Knight), in detecting the anachronism. "Jane," he said, "I wish you would tell me where you get those apple-trees of yours that come into bloom in July."

For the rest, Mr. Pollock passes all the novels in review, gives the outline of Miss Austen's life, and has some pleasant comparative criticisms on Miss Austen's contemporaries—Miss Burney, Miss Edgeworth, Mrs. Radcliffe, and so forth. His little book leads us to hope that Mr. Austin Dobson may see his way to reprint, in a separate volume, the admirable prefaces to the novels which he wrote for Messrs. Macmillan's edition; and in the interests of all those for whom there cannot be too much good "Gossip about Jane," some publisher should try to persuade Prof. A. W. Verrall to reduce his elaborate studies in Miss Austen to book form.

And, of course, he is only one specimen of the many examples which prove the possibility of living by the light of a reconstructed theology. The spectacle of the examples must always be the main evidence of the possibility, and for that reason it is well that they should be multiplied, even when they fall very far short of the learning, and the sobriety, and the restrained intensity of the 'Exploratio Evangelica.'"—*T. ## TEMPERATE CHILE: a PROGRESSIVE SPAIN.

By W. ANDERSON SMITH, formerly Special Commissioner to the Chilean Government to Report on their Rivers.

This is a type of book of which we have not too many—an intimate disclosure of a particular part of the world by a man who knows what he is writing about. It is neither a history nor the account of a tour, but a mixture of both; it deals with Chile politically, socially, and generally, besides giving an account of a tour throughout the southern part of the country, and the islands about the coast. The natural history chapters which deal with the tour are delightful, and distinctly reminiscent of Darwin's 'Journal of Researches' during the voyage of the Beagle, but the resemblance is in manner and subject only—the book is written with the freshness of first-hand knowledge.

Christmas Literature.

I.—Gift Books.

IN the matter of Christmas Gift-books adults come off this year with less success than children. Apparently most of the labour of authors, artists, binders, printers, and engravers has gone towards the beguilement of the nursery. But it is quite possible that, as the case stands, the adults are not getting too few books but the children too many.

Among the more considerable achievements among pictorial volumes we must mention prominently the noble work on Rubens (Heinemann) by Mr. Ernest Michel, a magnificent monument to the great Flemish painter. Mr. Malcolm Bell's Rembrandt (Bell), Lady Dilke's French Painters of the Eighteenth Century (Heinemann), Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse's British Contemporary Artists (Heinemann), Mr. C. A. Hutton's Greek Terra-cotta Statuettes (Seeley), The Art Journal for 1899, and Fifty Years of Art, both issued by Messrs. Virtue, the late Grant Allen's edition of White's Selborne (Lane), with illustrations by Mr. E. H. New, Mr. Nicholson's Twelve Portraits (Heinemann), Bunyan's Life and Death of Mr. Budman (Heinemann), with pictures by the Brothers Rhead, and Mr. C. D. Gibson's Education of Mr. Pipp (Lane)—all these deserve attention.

An illustrated edition of the Essays of Elia is, we believe, a departure for publishers of Lamb. The "Dissertation on Roast Pig" has been illustrated fully in a separate book, and other essays may have suggested pictures now and then, but a complete edition of the Essays and More Essays, with many pictures throughout, is a novelty. Mr. C. E. Brock is the artist in Mr. Dent's choice edition.

Perhaps the most charming of this year's illustrated novels is Charles Reade's Peg Woffington (Allen), with drawings by Mr. Hugh Thomson. We give one of these, depicting Mrs. Woffington's romps with Triplet's children. Another illustrated novel is George Eliot's Silas Marner (Blackwood), with dexterous drawings by Mr. Reginald Birch.

II.—Children's Books.

Turning from these books to books for children, the making of which has become so considerable an industry, we are confronted by a multitude too vast to deal with adequately. Already in two or three articles an attempt has been made in the ACADEMY to pick out the more striking examples, but many necessarily slipped through. If we were asked to name the twelve best nursery books of the season we should suggest these :

FOR BOYS' READING.

Stories from Froissart ... .. Edited by Henry Newbolt.
Tommy Smith's Animals ... By E. Selous.

FOR GIRLS' READING.

The Little Browns ... .. By Mabel E. Wotton.
The Other Side of the Sun ... By Evelyn Sharp.

FOR MIXED READING.

The Treasure Seekers ... .. By E. Nesbit.
The Red Book of Animal Stories By Andrew Lang.

PICTURES AND RHYMES.

The Golliwogg in War ... .. By the Misses Upton.
The Book of Penny Toys ... By Mrs. Dearmer.
The Book of Shops ... .. By F. D. Bedford.

FOR VERY SMALL CHILDREN.

Two Well-Worn Shoe Stories By J. Hasall and Cecil Aldin.
The Story of Little Black Sambo By Helen Bannerman.
Mother Duck's Children... .. By "Gugu."

This list, it will be seen, aims chiefly at younger children, stopping, say, except in the case of Froissart and Miss Nesbit, at about thirteen. There are, of course, countless other excellent story books, a few only of which we can enumerate: Mrs. Molesworth's This and That (Macmillan), Mrs. L. T. Meade's The Odds and the Evens (Chambers), Mr. Henty's A Roving Commission and the two collections of stories edited by him—Yule Tide (Longmans) and Peril and Prowess (Chambers), Mr. Manville Fenn's Fix Bay'nets! (Chambers) and Ned Leger (S.P.C.K.), Mr. Harry Collingwood's The Castaways (Griffith & Farran), Miss Evelyn Everett Green's Priscilla (Nelson), and Mr. A. H. Miles's new Fifty-Two and Twenty-Six volumes (Hutchinson).

The practice of extracting stories for children from the Classics is observable in full swing every Christmas. This year the author of Admirals All makes his first appearance in this connexion with a volume of Stories from Froissart (Wells Gardner), for which Mr. Gordon Browne has made drawings, one of which we reproduce. No book could be more timely, since the war spirit is now supreme. Mr. Newbolt has chosen well, and his Introduction is an excellent piece of work. The translation used is Lord Berners', with slight modifications.

Mr. Joseph Jacobs, who possesses a name honoured in the nursery for his collections of fairy tales, has this year gone to Boccaccio as Mr. Newbolt has gone to Froissart, and has brought away a sheaf of stories suitable for certain boys and girls. These are published by Mr. George Allen under the title Tales from Boccaccio. The tales are four in number, beginning with the sad history of patient Grissel, and ending with that of Isabel and the pot of basil. The illustrator is Mr. Byam Shaw, whose peculiar method could hardly have more suitable material. We reproduce one of Mr. Shaw's drawings. Now and then, in this book, he rises to greater heights than we remember, particularly in the fine picture facing page 90.

The child who has Mr. Andrew W. Tuer's Stories from Old-Fashioned Children's Books (The Leadenhall Press) will do well to ask someone older to select passages for reading aloud. Taken throughout it is somewhat stodgy. But read by a humorously-minded uncle, say, it might keep a room in a roar of irreverent laughter. Most of the stories, to-day, are less interesting than quaint. This is a passage that no longer could be written, from Dangerous Sports, 1808:

Always be careful to avoid any dog which you see running along, looking heavy and lowering, seemingly inattentive to everything, his eyes looking red and watery, and his tail hanging between his legs, lest it should be mad. If at any time you should be bitten by a dog, though ever so slightly, endeavour to ascertain whose dog it is, and immediately apprise your parents of the circumstance, since they will be the fittest to carry on the inquiry further, and even if the dog should have been mad, can prevent its being of the least ill consequence to you, if you give them early information.

Probably very old people will form the most grateful section of Mr. Tuer's public.

A new illustrator of unusual gifts is to be found in Mother Goose in Prose (Duckworth), new renderings of the old stories by Mr. Frank Baum. This is Mr. Maxfield Parrish, an American artist with a remarkable grotesque fancy and great power of hand. We reproduce an excellent specimen of Mr. Parrish's manner. It depicts the Man in the Moon stepping to earth.

Mr. Walter Crane's 1899 Christmas Book is entitled Blue Beard's Picture Book (Lane), and it consists of three of this artist's toy books bound in one: "Blue Beard," "The Sleeping Beauty," and "The Baby's Own Alphabet."

AN END-PAPER
FROM MR. WALTER CRANE'S "BLUE BEARD'S PICTURE BOOK."

In the end-paper which we reproduce Mr. Crane makes a concession to the militarism of the moment.

Small in size (it belongs to Mr. E. V. Lucas's "Dumpy Books for Children") and simple in its illustrations, The Story of Little Black Sambo, by Helen Bannerman (Grant Richards), takes a very high place among the children's books of the year. It is really funny, and really a child's book. Little Black Sambo has articles of clothing given to him one by one by his parents, and has them taken from him one by one by the tigers he meets in the jungle. We depict his trousers and also the fate of his umbrella. How Sambo recovered his possessions, and what became of the tigers, we shall not set forth; but we commend this book to everyone who wishes to find a child's book that will fill a home with laughter, and unite adults and infants in admiration.

"You could tie a knot on your tail, and carry it that way," said Little Black Sambo. "So I could," said the Tiger. "Give it to me, and I won't eat you this time." So he got poor Little Black Sambo's beautiful Green Umbrella, and went away saying, "Now I'm the grandest Tiger in the Jungle."

TWO PAGES REDUCED FROM "LITTLE BLACK SAMBO."

Among the original fairy stories, or whimsical stories, of the year, we should put Miss Evelyn Sharp's The Other Side of the Sun (Lane) easily first. Miss Sharp, as Wynns and All the Way to Fairyland have before proved, has a bright and winsome way. Also, she has an unfailing instinct for the social condition of fairyland. She knows fairyland, knows exactly what it is like and what kind of people one meets there. And then she has the prettiest thoughts and a gay sense of fun, and her stories are stories first and not, as in so many cases nowadays, merely the medium by which their author's cleverness can be best displayed. Miss Nellie Syrett's drawings are not so good as the text.

Other new fairy story-books for children include The Crock of Gold (Methuen), by Mr. Baring-Gould, wherein several well-known tales are retold by a Devonshire school-master named Jeremiah Toope, who plays Scheherazade to the distressed Queen of the Pixies in order, by his stories, to divert her mind from the death of her pet hedgehog. Mr. Toope tells them exceedingly well. Other old stories retold will be found in In the Chimney Corner (Harpers), by Seumas MacManus, a collection of Irish folk tales served up afresh in a pleasant brogue, with a few curious illustrations in bright colours. In this connexion we would also mention, with recommendations to perusal, The Princess of Hearts (Blackie), by Sheila E. Braine, and The Elephant's Apology (Blackie), by Alice Talwin Morris, with illustrations by Alice B. Woodward. Mr. Norman Garstin's The Suitors of Aprille (Lane) is a more conscious literary effort, but it is a pretty story with much delicate fancy interwoven.

Mr. Kenneth Grahame's Golden Age being a classic, it is unnecessary to say more of it here, except to recommend the illustrated edition which Mr. Lane has just published. We reproduce the frontispiece in the middle of this page. The artist, Mr. Maxfield Parrish, is the same who illustrated Mother Goose in Prose, referred to on another page. He is perhaps less happy with Mr. Grahame than with the old nursery rhymes, but his dexterity is remarkable.

Among the books primarily interesting to girls which can be cordially commended are two brisk and moving stories of families. Stories of families must be very bad indeed to be dull; but these are good. One deals with the Browns, the other with the Bastables. The Little Browns is by Miss Mabel E. Wotton, is illustrated by Mr. H. M. Brock, and is published by Messrs. Blackie. As a story of children for children it has hardly a fault, and the pictures are exactly what they should be. The Brown father was a professor (an old convention with writers of such books), and the culminating incident of the story is the discovery by Drusilla of an impending burglary and her gallant mission to give the alarm. The adventures of the Bastable children are to be found in The Treasure Seekers (Unwin), by E. Nesbit. Being reduced to comparative poverty, they set to work in various ways to gain riches. Among their devices is journalism, and the specimens of the paper which the historian gives are very choice. This is one item, under the heading "Curious Facts": "If you take a date's stone out and put in an almond and eat them together, it is prime. I found this out.—SUB-EDITOR." The book is really amusing, and it should be now beginning, not merely a Christmas life, as in the case of so many of the works before us, but a steady existence as a nursery history. To the family books which have been named might be added The Boys and I, by Mrs. Molesworth (Chambers), one of several stories by this favourite author which reach us this winter. Whether or not they are all new we cannot be certain, but The Boys and I is to be recommended.

A popular nursery author who would be missed if he did not produce an annual volume is Mr. G. E. Farrow, the creator of the Wallpug. Mr. Farrow's new book is called The Little Panjandrum's Dodo (Skeffington), which shows no falling off in high spirits and comic invention. Mr. Farrow's fun is inexhaustible, and his buoyant good humour unflagging. In Mr. Allan Wright he has found a sympathetic and humorous illustrator. Other new fairy tales, or whimsical tales, which are certain of a welcome are those contained in The Scarlet Herring volume by Judge Parry, published by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. The author of Katawampus and Butter Scotia has his steady public. The new book contains tales in Judge Parry's familiar and acceptable manner, and a sprinkling of high-spirited verse. Here is a scrap from the "Druid's Geography":

An Island's a piece of land surrounded by the sea,
A Lake's a Water Island in the land,
A Strait's a piece of water as narrow as may be,
And an Isthmus is a Strait that's made of sand.

Judge Parry's work has always a strong family flavour: one feels that he is writing primarily for the children he knows best; but he is clever enough to make others interested too. For Pierrette (Lane), a volume of fairy stories by Mr. H. de Vere Stacpoole, we have no praise. The author does not take himself seriously, and therefore his readers will not believe in his work. In writing fairy stories one cannot be too single-hearted and self-forgetful.

Among the large illustrated books—in the difficult oblong shape which convention demands and which is so hard to negotiate in a house—one of the most satisfactory is Two Well Worn Shoe Stories (Sands & Co.), by Mr. J. Hassall and Mr. Cecil Aldin. Mr. Hassall chooses the story of the old woman who lived in a shoe, and his treatment of it is excellent. The shoe house is a triumph of architectural cobbling, but one does not quite see why the nationality of the family should be Russian, as we gather it to be in Mr. Hassall's imagination. That does not, however, matter two pins. The point is that his draughtsmanship is strong and sure, and he has brought a very agreeable fancy to bear upon his work. Mr. Aldin is making great advances. One or two clever drawings to the story of the dame who lost her shoe suggest that he has better claims to the post of Caldecott's successor than anyone. Caldecott, however, would have spared us the realism with which Mr. Aldin has treated the old dame's foot.

Some Book Cases.

On the next page we give reproductions of eight of the more striking pictorial book covers of the season. The Tales from Boccaccio, designed by Mr. Byam Shaw, is published by Mr. George Allen; Gulliver's Travels and The Other Side of the Sun, designed respectively by Mr. Herbert Cole and Miss Nellie Syrett, are Mr. John Lane's; The Story of the Seven Young Goslings, designed by Mrs. Dearmer, is issued by Messrs. Blackie; and Cold Steel and Majuba, both designed by Mr. Kimborough, are Mr. Grant Richards's. The designers of Saunterings of Bookland (Messrs. Wells Gardner) and A New Ride to Khiva (Messrs. Pearson) we are not able to give.

LORD LYTTON'S
INDIAN ADMINISTRATION. BY LADY BETTY BALFOUR.

Time is bringing about its revenges, and giving us the perspective needful for the true appreciation of the statesmen who, like Lord Lytton and Sir Bartle Frere, were so venomously and ignorantly attacked in the dark, unhappy days of the early eighties. Lord Lytton was abused because he was not understood, but to-day, after the lapse of twenty years, all the world sees that he adopted the true policy, and that he possessed that prescience in which his opponents have proved so sadly lacking. In his will the Viceroy requested Lady Lytton "to endeavour to obtain the assistance of some statesman or writer, in whose ability and character she has confidence, for the production of a complete record of my Indian administration." Sir John Strachey began the work, but ill-health obliged him to abandon it, and finally Lady Betty Balfour took up the task of recording the years of her father's Indian administration. The two principal points of Lord Lytton's viceroyalty were the Great Assemblage at Delhi and the proclamation of the Queen as Kaiser-i-Hind on January 1, 1877, and the Afghan negotiations and war. Of the former it need only be said that it provided a feudal head for the great princes of India, and did more to satisfy them than years of good government have done. The Afghan War of 1879 was the outcome of events which took place before Lord Lytton's arrival in India, and really dated from 1870, when General Kaufmann sent a complimentary letter to the Ameer, and began the long series of Russian intrigues with Afghanistan. 1873, however, was the turning-point, as then Sher Ali made a last effort to obtain from the British Government more definite and practical protection from the unsolicited patronage of Russia. This Lord Northbrook, the Viceroy, was inclined to give, but the Duke of Argyll and Mr. Gladstone would only permit vague and empty promises, with the result that Sher Ali, in despair, naturally listened to Russia, and made an Afghan War merely a question of time. The book emphasises what those who have studied the matter have long known, and is, perhaps, all the more valuable for that reason. If Lord Lytton needed any justification it would be found in the map at the end of the book. In 1876 the north-west frontier of India was an absurd line zig-zagging across a plain, and intersected by rivers running at right angles to it: a hopeless position. Nowadays, thanks to Lord Lytton, it is among easily defensible mountains, and only the fact that it is drawn east of Kandahar recalls the craven fears of 1880. Lady Betty Balfour, who has been aided by Sir Alfred Lyall, Sir Charles Elliott and Sir Stuart Bayley, has produced a work which is invaluable as a record of a very crucial period in the history of British India. (Longmans & Co.)

LUTON CHURCH. BY THE LATE REV. HENRY COBBE.

He who faithfully writes the history of one old English Church achieves far more than a local work. Thus the late Mr. Cobbe's book is justified of its 662 large pages. These present record after record which illuminates not only Luton, but England. Luton is described as Lygeanburgh, "the fort upon the Lea," by a Saxon chronicler, c. 571. A royal manor under Saxon and Norman kings, Luton, says Mr. Cobbe, has seen in its streets, or heard in its fanes, many of the notables of both mediæval and modern times; while it can show in the history and present aspect of its venerable parish church, with its well-authenticated succession of clergy dating from Saxon times to the present hour, an evidence as well of the continuity of the National Church, alike through changes of race and dynasty, of policies and creed, as of the still-existent beauty of one at least of her mediæval fanes, notwithstanding both royal and fanatical despoilers.

In the Domesday Book Luton Church appears as a well-established church in "the king's demesne," endowed with five hides of land. On this basis of fact Mr. Cobbe made a scholarly study of the earlier history of the church and its lands, and their probable connexion with the first Christian rulers of Mercia. After the Norman Conquest the story of the church becomes clearer, and Mr. Cobbe follows it tenaciously, and displays it with an extraordinary wealth of detail through the Plantagenet, Reformation, and Act of Uniformity periods. The architectural and monumental features of the church, which is one of thirty-seven churches in the county all dedicated to St. Mary, are the subject of a long chapter. The magnitude and interest of the subject may be judged by the fact that Mr. Cobbe's list of known rectors and vicars of Luton Church extends back to the reign of Stephen. Among the patrons of the living have been Edward III., Cardinal Wolsey, Queen Elizabeth, and King George III. In his untiring efforts to elucidate every point and period, Mr. Cobbe has made investigations which extend to the township of Luton and the county. His appendixes fill 300 pages. A work like this does not touch the popular imagination, yet historians and antiquarians are not the only readers who will value Mr. Cobbe's labours. This book has the undying interest of thorough work rightly directed. (Bell & Sons. 12s. 6d. net.)

THE STORY OF TRISTAN AND ISEULT.

RENDERED INTO ENGLISH BY JESSIE L. WESTON.

This is the second instalment of Miss Weston's "Arthurian Romances Unrepresented in Malory." There can be no question as to the value of the text which serves it as a basis. This is the German version of the story of Tristan begun by Gottfried von Strassburg about 1210. It belongs to the smaller group of Tristan stories, in which the legend is quite disconnected from the all-embracing Arthurian legend which, in so many writers, from Beroul to Malory and from Malory to Tennyson, has absorbed it. As literature it is probably the best version of all. Gottfried was a considerable poet, and told the immortal tale with a sympathetic understanding of its emotional possibilities, and with a skill in narrative art which was beyond the reach of many writers of romances. We are not altogether pleased with Miss Weston's abridged prose rendering. Perhaps Mr. Lang and Mr. Bourdillon and Dr. Sebastian Evans have spoilt us for more pedestrian work; but certainly this English is undistinguished, and fails to reproduce the colour and quality of mediæval writing. And in abridging at all has not Miss Weston rather sacrificed the scholar to the general reader, who, after all, will imperfectly appreciate the sacrifice? A few repetitions hurt nobody, and modern taste hardly requires the softening of mediæval manners and customs. At the same time, Miss Weston's introduction and notes show her to be herself a scholar well acquainted with the intricacies of Romance problems, and we venture to take it that she has left out nothing very material. Miss Caroline Watts has contributed some pleasing initials and chapter headings, in which she makes good use of the interlaced ornament which Christian Ireland borrowed from Byzantium. (Nutt.)

OLIVER CROMWELL:
HIS LIFE AND CHARACTER.

BY ARTHUR PATERSON.

Mr. Paterson's idea, in adding one more to the many biographies of Cromwell, is to eschew the historical background, and confine himself strictly to the personal life of his hero. For hero he is to Mr. Paterson. Mr. Paterson is firmly imbued with the conviction that the Protector was an honest and straightforward-minded man, guided throughout his career by the most patriotic and unselfish motives. This contention has been upheld by one writer after another since Carlyle published his eloquent defence of the greatest of the Puritans. Mr. Paterson is conspicuously quiet and moderate in his tone, for all his thorough-going advocacy. There is no vituperation of adversaries, and he seeks to establish all his conclusions by reason. But, in the main, does he present to us anything new? Does he shed any fresh light on the character of the Protector? Do we rise from the book feeling that we have a glimpse of another or a more intimate Cromwell than was revealed to us in the many previous biographies? We think not. Essentially, it is the Cromwell of Carlyle. In detail we glean little that has not been stated in other lives, and those recent. It is chiefly in the studious moderation of tone that this book has, we think, an advantage over its immediate predecessors. But that it brings us closer to Cromwell we do not feel.

Of course, this attempt to reconstruct a great historical character is always a fascinating exercise, having some kinship to the imaginative sympathy of the historical novelist. But, in the main, it must always reduce itself chiefly to motive-mongering; and motive-mongering is but an unsatisfactory business. It is tinged by the notions of the person who engages in the game. What were Cromwell's motives in the great crises of his life—whether he were wholly sincere in the open protestations of disinterested religion which he made throughout his career—make very pretty matter for speculation and defence. But only Cromwell knew—or did he know? To us the great interest lies in his certain and indisputable achievement: the way in which the organisation which he devised for his troop of horse was rapidly extended, first to the army of the Eastern Counties, and finally to the entire Puritan host; the spectacle of one man moulding to his will an army and a nation, in the face of a hostile or inert majority, and raising England—in her own despite—to a position she had not known since Elizabeth. Of these things there is no dispute. Nor are they the privilege of any individual historian. Mr. Paterson's Life is sound, sensible, well and moderately written; but it scarcely takes the place he would seem to desire for it. (Nisbet & Co.)

Fiction.

Miranda of the Balcony. By A. E. W. Mason.
(Macmillan & Co. 6s.)

A STORY, a story pure and simple, free of divagations, digressions, and all other literary embroideries! But there is little to be said about it, except that the author handles English like a craftsman, and has a fine natural instinct for direct and vivacious narrative. Miranda calls for neither argument nor exposition. Mr. Mason's descriptive powers are now mature. It is improbable that he will ever reach up to any height of the verbal magic; he seldom, if ever, writes under the spell of an inspiration; but what a man of talent can do with his native tongue that Mr. Mason does. Here is a specimen of his best, the scene being the sea round about the Scilly Isles:

He made no attempt to land upon the Lighthouse. The relief men were hoisted up in the slug, the head-keeper and one of his assistants were lowered, and the lugger started upon its homeward run before the wind. The fog thickened and lightened about them as they threaded the intricate channels of the western islands. Now it was a thin grey mist, parting here and there in long corridors, driven this way and that, twirling in spires of smoke, shepherded by the winds; now again it hung close about them an impenetrable umber, while the crew in short quick tones and gestures of the arms mapped out the rocks and passages. About them they could hear the roar of the breaking waves and the rush of water up slabs and over ledges, and then the "glumph glumph" as the wave sucked away. At times, too, the fog lifted from the surface and hung very low, massed above their heads, so that the black hillocks of the islets stood out in the sinister light like headstones of a cemetery of the sea, and at the feet of them the water was white like a flash of angry teeth.

This is dignified and worthy work. Though Mr. Mason's tale is strictly of to-day, it passes in many lands. He can describe Tangier and Plymouth and Spain and the Scillies with an equal facility and felicity, and he has some touch of "the true romance." Mixed up with wild adventure and strange, uncanny happenings are swift hints of the Strand's actuality, which serve their double purpose of piquancy and verisimilitude:

The lights of a theatre attracted him. He paid his money, took a seat in the stalls, and was at once very worried and perplexed. He turned to his neighbour, who was boisterously laughing.

"Would you mind telling me what this play is?" he asked.

"Oh, it's a musical comedy."

"I see. But what is it about?"

Charnock's neighbour scratched his head thoughtfully.

"I ought to remember," he said, "for I saw the piece early in the run."

The four principal characters are convincing enough, and it is in the heroine's favour that she is not offensively heroic, though she can bring a riding-whip across a man's face with the best. The villain, "Major" Wilbraham, with his aspirations towards rendering Horace, is excellent. Miranda of the Balcony, in fine, is a thoroughly satisfactory book.

The Barrys. By Shan F. Bullock.
(Harpers. 6s.)

OF all human failings that versatility of the heart which is paradoxically known as heartlessness is the most intelligible and the least excused. It is not in an Englishman's nature to write scientifically of the amorist: his blood boils. But The Barrys is remarkable in this, that it puts before us an amorist who stands self-revealed, with "humanity" written as it were all over his baseness. Mr. Shan Bullock has indeed a remarkable talent for imbuing unconventional narrative, which is not autobiographical, with the very spirit of his characters. He is like some first-rate reporter who can hear people think. One knows that his own style is clear, straight, eloquent; but he is so nearly the stage manager, pure and simple, that one forgets all about him. Regarded as a story The Barrys is deeply interesting. The reader is face to face with the element in male nature which was the inspiration of Salt Lake City, and he cannot help a furtive sympathy for the young man who was thrown into the company of Irish Nan after he had plighted troth to English Marian. Our own sympathy subsided when we perused the journal kept by this poor creature after his rupture with his wife. A literary man who, we are given to understand, became famous would surely not have committed himself to such trash. It is a pity that Mr. Bullock should have adopted this threadbare device for revealing human nature. For, as we have indicated, it is his special talent to be independent of such devices. Again, the dénouement is very pathetic, yet the reader instinctively resents the sacrifice of Frank Barry's child in order to teach Frank Barry that he was not a man. The figure of the other Barry, the rugged and upright old man, who in his lonely farmhouse watches with stern disapproval the shiftiness and insincerity of a beloved nephew, is admirably drawn; so, too, is the hopelessly loquacious Irishman, John Butler, and the naturalness of the dialogue throughout is much to be commended. The horrible condescension of the literary mind towards nature and man is one of the more odious traits of the amorist; one feels he is incapable of bleeding.

Wine on the Lees. By John A. Steuart.
(Hutchinson & Co. 6s.)

MR. STEUART'S book has the solidity and knowingness of good reporting. It has style too, and a good idea at the bottom of it. The thing one regrets is that the story is not a natural growth, but a sort of realistic fantasy with a violent and improbable termination. Mr. Steuart describes the way in which a sense of the evils of the drink traffic steals into the mind of a rich brewer's only surviving son. The situation suggests terrors which escape Mr. Steuart, but the immediate pathos of it he grasps. The ineffectiveness of the book lies rather in its over-elaboration than its perfunctoriness. We hear a great deal of picturesque slang, but somehow we don't "hear the East a-callin'." The ex-soldier and brutal husband who accompanies the hero on his journey through Drinkland is full of vitality, but once he addresses Lady Twickham, the brewer's wife, in language fatally reminiscent of the comic stage, and once he sentimentalises. Similarly a gentleman doffer is differentiated from the roughs by an exaggerated bookishness of speech. It is the unexpected pathos that tells. The proverb says it also "arrives." And there lies the trouble with Mr. Steuart. He is the slave of the obvious. He is adroit in writing, but bad in composition. Still, Mr. Steuart is highly instructive and sometimes quite human and sympathetic.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

FOLLY AND FRESH AIR. BY EDEN PHILLPOTTS.

An extended new edition of one of the most genial books by the author of The Human Boy. It is the good-humoured happy-go-lucky narrative of a holiday on Dartmoor, somewhat in the manner of Three Men in a Boat, but nearer to life. Mr. Phillpotts's is essentially a holiday book. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

THE PRINCESS XENIA. BY H. B. MARRIOTT-WATSON.

A romance by the author of Diogenes in London and Galloping Dick. The story is of romantic deeds in modern life, and there is the inevitable German State. "'Good,' ejaculated Christopher. 'But there will be no dying. We shall carry it as a jest. The Margrave rides with an escort of the Palace Guards—three in number. You see I am frank with you. We may have a brush, but there will be more danger when the affair is over.' 'You mean of discovery?' asked Kreiss. 'I mean that the outrage will most likely be treated as of international importance.'" (Harper. 6s.)

ANYHOW STORIES. BY MRS. W. K. CLIFFORD.

An enlargement of a book published several years ago. Mrs. Clifford has added, among others, "Wooden Tony," and there are new illustrations by Lady Stanley (Miss Dorothy Tennant) and the Hon John Collier. The book, which has been revised for this edition, contains some of the most charming stories of children that have been written. (Duckworth. 3s. 6d.)

ONE QUEEN TRIUMPHANT. BY FRANK MATHEW.

A pleasant historical romance. "Queen Elizabeth sat in the garden by the river," is the first sentence. "On my left the red walls of Hampton Court had a deepened tint. The garden was shining with multitudinous roses. All was quiet as if the day was a Sabbath." But the story is not all Sabbath calm: it includes a vivid picture of the execution of Mary Queen of Scots. (Lane. 6s.)

DONNA TERESA.

BY FRANCES MARY PEARD.

Donna Teresa is the young English widow of an Italian nobleman. We are here concerned with her later loving, and with that of her sister Sylvia. The story is a tragedy, and is laid in Rome, which, in Mrs. Peard's experienced hands, yields attractive backgrounds. (Macmillan. 6s.)

IN CONNECTION WITH THE DE WILLOUGHBY CLAIM. BY FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT.

In this story, by the author of Little Lord Fauntleroy, we are in the States after the War of Secession, when claims for compensation were being put before the Government. The story on which the De Willoughby claim is founded is vouched for by Judge Rutherford as the "Lord's truth"; but Farquhar reminds him that "as a rule it isn't the Lord's truth that carries a big claim through." A good novel of national life and love's young dream. (Warne & Co. 6s.)

ALLAN DARKE. BY CHARLES DONNEL GIBSON.

An American novel. Allan Darke, a young Virginian, is the sole survivor of a shipwreck, and is astonished to find himself thrown among personal enemies, of whose existence he had no previous knowledge. To these shore-dwellers his name is hateful, and some mystery of the past can alone explain their feelings toward him. The story is concerned with this mystery, from which love is evolved in due time. (The Macmillan Co. 6s.)

THE UNDOING OF JOHN BREWSTER. BY MABEL HOWARD.

"John pulled himself together. . . . 'I have asked Donna Carmella to marry me'; and he paused. The next words came with great difficulty. 'I am going to become a Roman Catholic.' For some minutes there was silence—a heavy, intense silence, broken only by the burning of the fire and the ticking of the clock. Then a cry broke from his mother: 'Oh, John! my boy! my boy!'" This is one of the central situations of the story. (Longmans. 6s.)

MANY WATERS. BY K. RHODES.

"For one moment earth, sea, and sky became a blank, a feeling of death came over Stella." Presently she said—but "her voice sounded far away and unreal": "So he is engaged! To Miss Brandon, of course. I have expected it for some time." (Digby, Long & Co. 6s.)

THE SIREN'S WEB. BY MARY THOMAS.

A story of London society. Sir Vyell Tremaine succumbs to the dazzling and voluptuous charms of Stella Gascoigne after he has become engaged to Patience Wainwright, a pretty Bristol Quakeress. This story of his entanglement is very readable. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

MORA. BY T. W. SPEIGHT.

A rather farcical love-story laid at the Palatine Hotel in the Lake District. Lady Renshaw—"the old she-dragon"—is the butt of the story. She "dotes on nature," and observes that a landscape is "quite Ruskinian." (Greening. 6s.)

THE PRINCE'S FEATHERS. BY MRS. LEITH-ADAMS.

A story of old Warwickshire. "Who was Bessie, 'the flower of Leamside,' and what noble house harks back to the blue-eyed fledging, Robin, as its ancestor? In whose veins flows the blood of the little clear-starcher of Bidcombe village—she whose dainty fingers goffered the snowy furbelows for the great ladies who graced the hostelry of the Prince's Feathers?" The question is not answered, but is interestingly stated in this story. (Digby, Long & Co. 6s.)

The "Academy's" Awards to Authors.

WE have under consideration a scheme for extending the scope of the ACADEMY's awards to authors. In former years we have given our awards of One Hundred Guineas and Fifty Guineas to writers who have published works of signal merit during the year, as the following list of books the ACADEMY has crowned shows:

1897.

Mr. Stephen Phillips, for his volume of Poems.

Mr. W. E. Henley, for his Essay on Burns.

1898.

Mr. Sidney Lee, for A Life of Shakespeare.

Mr. Maurice Hewlett, for The Forest Lovers.

Mr. Joseph Conrad, for Tales of Unrest.

Still keeping before us the encouragement of promise, sincerity, and thoroughness in literary art, we propose this year to devote the sum of One Hundred and Fifty Guineas to writers who are, so to speak, still serving their apprenticeship. The money will be divided into six portions of Twenty-five Guineas each, which we shall award to the successful competitors in six literary exercises set by the ACADEMY. The subjects will be announced, and full particulars given, in our next issue.

Literature in : 1899 a Retrospect.

THE lover of fine letters must often long for the days of Grub-street. Such genial optimists as Sir Walter Besant are never tired of reminding us how in these latter days literature has become a lucrative profession; how the copy-rights of the successful novelist are "property"; and how he may own his bank-book and his man of business. The truth is, of course, that to art of whatever kind prosperity is far more dangerous than adversity. So long as a competency at the most was to be gained, the artist went on his solitary and flowery way rejoicing: let but the mirage of a fortune gild the distance, and straightway the road is crowded with adventurers, questing for the new Klondike. The artist himself is caught with the fever. The undeniable good things that wealth can give dazzle his vision. After all, he, too, is human: he has his wife and child to take heed for: the lust of life runs riot in his veins. What wonder if the subtle temptation too often prevails, and he loses his high ideals?

To break his fall there are sophistries. What is art, he may plead, if it is divorced from life? Is not the power to reach the great heart of the public, to move a multitude to tears and laughter, a real criterion of greatness? Are greatness and popularity incompatible? Was not Shakespeare popular, and Dickens? And, in our own day, have not Stevenson and Barrie demonstrated the fallacy that true art is but for a few alone? Well, Stevenson, for all his genius, had a low view of the artist's calling. Hear him in "A Letter to a Young Gentleman":

To live by a pleasure is not a high calling; it involves patronage, however veiled; it numbers the artist, however ambitious, along with dancing girls and billiard markers. The French have a romantic evasion for ore employment, and call its practitioners the Daughters of Joy. The artist is of the same family, he is of the Sons of Joy, chose his trade to please himself, gains his livelihood by pleasing others, and has parted with something of the sterner dignity of man.

You may infer this, and with justice, written in a somewhat pessimistic mood; nevertheless it has its truth, for the artist who looks to win a fortune by his art. That a test of the artist's work is to please is undeniable. The question is, who is to be pleased? So long as it is the artist himself, or the ideal reader, conceived in the abstract or envisaged in the particular, then the human dignity remains impaired. If a sheep's eye be cast at the patron or the mob, at Dives with the purse or Demos with the purse, the human dignity begins to totter on its pedestal.

Certainly it is true—and fifty examples could be adduced to prove it—that to be an artist does not necessarily condemn a writer to unpopularity. Great books have found their readers turn and turn about with the veriest trash. It is the unaccountableness, the whimsicality of the popular choice, that is so baffling. Are not the critics greatly to blame, for after all Demos has not much selection of his own? He is a humble creature, easily led faculty, and only too ready to fill his bookshelves and make out his library list in accordance with the bidding of his favourite newspaper. It is in the power of the critics to direct him aright, and in so doing to maintain the standard of thought and workmanship in the artists. But do they do this? Modern newspaper criticism has many qualities of sympathy and enthusiasm. It is generous and appreciative to a fault. But that it speaks with any authority or discrimination, or that it has any reasonable perspective, we are unable to persuade ourselves. Were it so, would the publishers' columns be able to proclaim masterpiece after masterpiece on the strength of one notice or another in journals of literary repute?

Poetry.

As usual, we begin our detailed survey of the year's literary production with poetry. Obviously poetry is less liable than some other forms of literature to the Capuan temptations to which we have referred. With the possible exception of Mr. Kipling, there is probably no living poet whose verse counts as a serious item in his annual budget. In any case, this has been a comparatively good year for poetry. In the forefront we should put Mr. Thomas Hardy's Wessex Poems, which was issued after the publication of our article on "Literature in 1898"; remarkable not only for their intrinsic merit, but also as showing that there is at least one other great living novelist, besides Mr. Meredith, who is poet too. Something roughhewn in technique, something morbid in sentiment, Mr. Hardy's verse reflects with simplicity and directness the individuality of the writer, while for many ears its austere melancholy music has a singular fascination. Mr. Hardy came as a surprise. Of expected poets there are but few—Mr. William Watson and Mr. Francis Thompson the chief—who have been silent this year. The new work of Mr. Swinburne and Mr. Stephen Phillips comes under the head of literary drama, and that of Mr. Henley has not yet appeared in volume form; but Mr. Bridges, Mr. Yeats, Mr. Davidson, and Mr. Binyon all fall to be dealt with here. Each of these pursues a different ideal of beauty, and each pursues it this year with conspicuous and growing success. The New Poems added to Mr. Bridges's Collected Works are of a delicate vision and a delicate music. Mr. Yeats, in The Wind among the Reeds, is mystical, unearthly, and inveterately Celtic. Mr. Davidson, in The Last Ballad, maintains his mastery over the romantic quatrain. Mr. Binyon, in the Second Book of London Visions, creates some masterly and unforgettable images of common things. After these come Mr. Eugene Mason, whose Field Floridus, though, to our thinking, a little derivative in its combination of erotic and religious sensuousness, is yet a notable production, and Miss Winifred Lucas, whose Fugitives, sensitive, thoughtful, and at times a little fine-spun, are much in the vein of her Units of three years back. Among new, or practically new, writers we note Mr. A. B. Miall, whose Poems are creditable exercises in several schools; Mr. Sturge Moore, whose Vine Dresser shows individuality and largeness of vision, but misses excellence by just the impalpable something; Miss Elinor Sweetman, whose Pastorals have a charming freshness of imagery and vigour of rhythm; Mr. Edmond Holmes, whose Shakespearean sonnets, The Silence of Love, are, in their musical thoughtfulness, as well as in their lack of colour, a little outside the modern range; and the anonymous author of The City of the Soul, in whom both the qualities and the defects of such work as Mr. Mason's are carried to a still higher degree. We should not like to pass over altogether without notice Mr. Laurence Housman's The Little Land, Mr. Money-Coutts's Alhambra, Mr. Willmore's The Soul's Departure, and Miss Dora Sigerson's The Feery Changeling.

Anthologies have not been quite so numerous as in some recent years. The British Anthologies, begun by Prof. Arber, contain some rare and interesting pieces; but on the whole they show that the power to choose does not invariably accompany a high reputation for scholarship. The Garland of New Poetry is notable less for its contents than for the fact that it is an experiment on the lines of the French L'Année des Poètes.

Literary Drama.

Writers are still questing after the golden fleece of the literary drama. Mr. Swinburne, indeed, is no new venturer in these waters. His second Rosamund is good poetry in his less flamboyant later manner, but the theme of Lombardic barbarism barely yields the true tragic note. Of Mr. Stephen Phillips's Paolo and Francesca we speak elsewhere in this number. Another notable poetical play is the Osborn and Ursyne of John Oliver Hobbes. Two prose plays, The Heather Field and Mæve, by a new writer, Mr. Edward Martyn, awoke the dust of newspaper controversy. A performance of the former play in Dublin proclaimed its merit; a performance in London left the question still in dispute.

Essays.

Of all the forms of literature the essay appears to be that which makes the least appeal to the man in the street. Even more than poetry, indeed, it claims the collaboration of the reader, and its undeniable fascination is for the few who can contribute their share. These will not have found the year a barren one. The English translation of Maeterlinck's Wisdom and Destiny would alone save it from that reproach. So would Mrs. Meynell's The Spirit of Place, full, like her earlier volumes, of high thinking, subtle phrasing, and delicate observation. So, again, would Mr. Austin Dobson's A Paladin of Philanthropy, yet another volume of eighteenth century vignettes, written out of that wonderful knowledge of his chosen period which few men can claim to share with Mr. Dobson, and with that ease and distinction of style which is his peculiar characteristic. The eighteenth century, too, is the theme of a delightful volume of Johnson Club Papers, by many hands; while as a pendant to Mrs. Meynell's collection there is the similarly named Genius Loci of Vernon Lee, elaborate to artificiality but daintily rendering the local colour of many chosen spots in Italy, France, and Germany. If Vernon Lee is elaborate to artificiality, Mr. Max Beerbohm is artificial to affectation, and the quality goes far to spoil his More. Mr. Beerbohm has originality alike of vision, of judgment, and of expression; and when he takes it into his head to put away the childish things which hitherto have served his purpose, he may begin to do work worthy of his real talent. Among other volumes of essays well deserving of notice are Mr. Archer's Study and Stage, Mr. Wedmore's Books and Art and Mr. Gwynn's Decay of Sensibility. Finally, there is Lord Rosebery's Appreciations and Addresses. These range from a funeral oration to an after-dinner impromptu. Naturally they do not in many cases go very deep, and they lack the final polish which a reporter can hardly be expected to give, but there is a dignity and gracefulness of touch about them all which show, as did the Life of Pitt, that in Lord Rosebery's complex nature the littérateur runs the statesman hard.

Literary History.

We have suggested above that the affability of literary criticism is a feature to be regretted in modern letters. Throughout the volumes just enumerated are scattered a few essays in criticism pure and simple. Wholly critical, again, in intention, is the manifesto put forward by Mr. Yeats and others in the pamphlet entitled Literary Ideals in Ireland. But for the most part the workings of the critical faculty are to be sought nowadays, not so much in any form of writing which has a direct outlook upon modern creative achievement, as in books of erudition dealing with literary history. Of these, this year has shown no stint. The most important work is probably Mr. Gosse's Life and Letters of John Donne, a serious and in the main successful attempt to write one of the great unwritten lives. Then there are some interesting little critical monographs by Prof. Saintsbury on Matthew Arnold, by Mr. Gwynn on Tennyson, and by Mr. Cope Cornford on Stevenson. That the study of Shakespeare has not yet lost its recent vogue is shown by the issue of more than one new library edition of the plays, by Mr. Samuel Butler's fresh attack on the problem of the Sonnets, by M. Jusserand's admirable Shakespeare in France, and by Father Bowden's polemical Religion of Shakespeare. Other contributions to the subject of great interest are in prospect. Set literary histories have been plentiful. Scottish Vernacular Literature has had its tale told by Mr. T. F. Henderson, the Literary History of Ireland, by Dr. Douglas Hyde, Japanese Literature by Mr. W. G. Aston, Bohemian Literature by Count Lützow, Yiddish Literature by Dr. Wiener. Among monographs upon special periods Mr. Oliver Elton's The Augustan Ages stands out as a work of excellent learning and critical capacity. Mr. Snell's The Fourteenth Century belongs to the same series. A study of American provenance, Mr. H. A. Beers's Romanticism in the Eighteenth Century is also noteworthy. Of anecdota and new editions of texts there has not been a great deal. Dr. Birkbeck Hill has printed some new Swift Letters, and Mr. Stephen Wheeler some new Landor Letters. Mr. Vincent has added Carew's Poems to the "Muses Library" and Mr. Whibley Holland's Suetonius to the "Tudor Translations." Mr. Wheatley has completed his monumental edition of Pepys' Diary. Mr. Beeching has published some excellent Selections from Daniel and Drayton. And that is about all.

Biography.

Biography continues to attract the attention of a public curious, before all things, of individuality. Under this head we account the most fascinating form of biography—private letters. The Lore Letters of Robert and Elizabeth Barrett Browning and the Letters of R. L. Stevenson vie with each other in interest, alike for their revelations of individuality and for the material which they supply to the critic of nineteenth century literature. Of somewhat less value are the Letters of Benjamin Jowett, which do not add very much of importance to his already published Life. Among regular biographies we must single out Mr. Mackail's Life of William Morris, a model, in its sympathetic and scholarly treatment, of what such things should be. Good, too, are Lord Grey's Hubert Hervey and Prof. Rendel Harris's Life of F. W. Crossley. Dr. Knapp's George Borrow and Mr. Lewis Melville's William Makepeace Thackeray are, in their various ways, somewhat disappointing. Among a number of other biographies and autobiographies may be mentioned those of Sir John Millais, Dean Liddell, the younger Pitt, Sir Robert Peel, Lord Selborne, James and Horace Smith, Mrs. Oliphant, Susan Ferrier, Prof. Palgrave, R. H. Quick, and Lewis Carroll. Volumes of reminiscences have been written by Mr. Justin McCarthy, Mr. G. W. E. Russell, and Sir Algernon West.

History, Anthropology, Art.

Three branches of learning are well represented among this year's works of scholarship. We regret our space only permits of the briefest résumé of what has been done in each field.

In History the event of the year has been the return of Sir George Trevelyan to the scene of his early labours. His American Revolution has all the old brilliance and something of the old tendency to partisanship. In his father's footsteps follows Mr. G. M. Trevelyan, whose England in the Age of Wycliffe is a solid and valuable study. Mr. Herbert Fisher's The Medieval Empire, Prof. Dill's Roman Society in the Western Empire, and Mr. Bolton King's History of Italian Unity, are all books which deserve to make the reputation of their authors. The final instalments of Lady Verney's Verney Memoirs and of Dr. Hodgkin's Italy and Her Invaders complete two works, each of which is in its way already a classic. Sir William Hunter has published the first volume of an elaborate History of British India. Mr. J. H. Round's The Commune of London and Dom Gasquet's On the Eve of the Reformation contain valuable historical essays, and Mr. F. S. Stevenson's Robert Grosseteste belongs to the interesting genre of historical biography.

Under Anthropology we may class a number of books dealing with one aspect or another of the life and belief of primitive man, a topic of investigation which is rapidly growing in popularity. Mr. A. H. Keane's Man Past and Present approaches the subject from the widest point of view. Miss Mary Kingsley's West African Studies, Prof. Spencer and Mr. Gillen's Tribes of Central Australia, and Mr. Mathew's Eagle, Hawk, and Crow are special investigations into particular peoples. Prof. Max Müller's Seven Systems of Indian Philosophy, Sir Alfred Lyall's Asiatic Studies, and Prof. Campbell's Religion in Greek Literature deal mainly with the higher development of religious thought; while the more rudimentary types of cult and belief are considered in Mr. W. W. Fowler's Roman Festivals of the Republic, Mr. Chadwick's Cult of Othin, Mrs. Gomme's Traditional Games, Mr. Curtin's Creation Myths of Central America, Miss Hull's The Cuchullin Saga, Mr. Simpson's The Jonah Legend, and Mr. Leland's Aradia.

Books upon Art appear to be enjoying a vogue, which has been stimulated by the commencement of two new series of critical monographs, in one of which Mr. Roger Fry's Giovanni Bellini, in the other a reprint of Mr. R. A. M. Stevenson's Velasquez, are so far the most memorable volumes. More elaborate and expensive works include Lady Dilke's French Art in the Eighteenth Century, Mr. and Mrs. Pennell's Lithography and Lithographers, and Mr. H. P. Horne's Sandro Botticelli. Miss Rose Kingsley's History of French Art also deserves mention.

Miscellaneous.

Nor have other branches of learning entirely withered in the cold shades of neglect. Philosophy is not entirely monopolised by Mr. Lecky with his Democracy and Liberty and his Map of Life. Volumes of lectures by the late Principal Caird and the late Prof. Wallace belong to the formerly dominant Hegelian School. A more psychological idealism takes shape in Mr. James Ward's Agnosticism and Materialism. Theology is represented by the big new Encyclopædia Biblica and Prof. Percy Gardner's Exploratio Ecangelica; Science by Sir A. Lubbock's Buds and Stipules, Sociology by Mrs. Stetson's Women and Economics, and Travel by Mr. Cunninghame Graham's Mogreb el Acksa.

Journalism continues to invade the borders of literature. The outstanding examples are Mr. Steevens's Tragedy of Dreyfus and his volume called In India, a brilliant series of snapshot impressions. Great descriptive facility and a sure power of getting to the point make Mr. Steevens a really remarkable Special Correspondent. Probably no other living Englishman would know half so much about India after a six weeks' sojourn there as Mr. Steevens does. Another excellent book on Dreyfus has been done by Mr. F. C. Conybeare. Events in South Africa have led to quite a shoal of publications, few of which can compare either in literary gifts or in disinterestedness with Prof. Bryce's re-issued Impressions of South Africa. Many people in America and a few in England have been entertained by the Mr. Dooley in Peace and War of a new humorist, Mr. Dunne.

Fiction.

Again, in 1899, both Mr. George Meredith and Mr. Thomas Hardy have refrained from publishing a novel. No year which passes without a book from either of them can be called quite of the first interest, since these two names dominate beyond question the art of fiction in England. Nevertheless, if the past twelve months have shown anything, they have shown that our novel-writing is in a tolerably healthy and vigorous condition. There are few, if any, masterpieces in the record; but, on the other hand, the number of novels which disclose, not only individuality, but real imagination and a feeling for style, is, we think, larger than usual. The year seems to us to have been distinctly a year of promise, not without some actual achievement.

After the two great names mentioned above, Mr. Kipling comes next in order. He it is who holds the gaze of the continents. Now Stalky & Co., though a small book, has aroused much controversy. It has been praised as a miracle, and held up to censure as merely a preposterous fantasia. For our part, we consider that the time to judge it has not yet come. One thing, however, can be said of it with certainty, that it has sincerity, but not realism. It has sold well, but not nearly so well as The Day's Work. Mr. Henry James is content this year with one book, The Awkward Age, which in no wise departs from his later manner. That manner may have its disadvantages, but if you except the manner you must grant that the work attains a high degree of perfection. As a craftsman Mr. Henry James remains unsurpassed, and The Awkward Age is worthy of him. Of the next younger generation of writers Mr. J. M. Barrie has been silent. That book which is to eclipse A Window in Thrums has still to come. Mr. Zangwill, in They that Walk in Darkness, has produced another volume of Ghetto stories, of various dates and very uneven merit. There is fine work in the book, but it does little to consolidate the author's reputation. Q's The Ship of Stars, being a study of boyhood, has more fancy than imagination, and perhaps more imagination than form; at the same time it is well written, and its dreamy quality fascinates, without gripping. Mr. H. G. Wells has pursued his prophetic career in When the Sleeper Wakes, a vision of the future which includes some of his best and some of his second best work. More important are his Tales of Space and Time, among which may be found one or two stories that are in the first rank of the fantastic. Mr. Anthony Hope has shown in The King's Mirror that popularity has not robbed him of his artistic sincerity. The book, while plainly proving Mr. Hope's limitations, is fastidiously accomplished, and shows a rare combination of vivacity with subtlety. Mr. Harold Frederic's last posthumous novel, The Market Place, is finely satisfactory, scarcely inferior to Illumination, and it serves to emphasise the more one's regret for his loss. Mr. Eden Phillpotts produces a novel only in alternate years, and the present is not his year; but we have had from him two volumes of stories, of which the second and better, The Human Boy, considered in point of time with Stalky & Co., and, as regards method and attitude, formed an interesting artistic contrast to Mr. Kipling's work. In To London Town, Mr. Arthur Morrison, of whom it may be said that he does not over-produce, gave us an idyllic book full of fresh and delightful local colour, and elaborately wrought, but thin as to texture, and apparently out of his natural vein.

Coming to a generation still younger in art than the foregoing, we must refer to Mr. Walter Raymond, with Two Men o' Mendip and No Soul above Money, both of which only just escape being masterly; to "Benjamin Swift," whose Siren City is probably his best work since Nancy Noon, but by no means the fine book we expect from him, and to Dartnell, a return to his earlier manner; to Mr. Maurice Hewlett, whose Little Novels of Italy have a fine free way and that peculiar zest in life which Mr. Hewlett alone is giving us; to Miss Gertrude Atherton, whose Daughter of the Vine is strong, brutal, and ill-knit; to Mr. R. W. Chambers, whose communistic novel, Ashes of Empire, proves for at least the fifth time that he is a man to be specially noted; to Mr. Neil Munro, whose Gilian the Dreamer has received much praise and much patronage, but which strikes us as less good than his best; to Mr. A. E. W. Mason, whose Miranda of the Balcony and The Watchers are neither of them unworthy of Morrice Buckler; to Mr. R. S. Hichens, whose The Slave is clever, esoteric, fantastic, and enormous; and to Mr. John Buchan, whose Lost Lady of Old Years, with all its charm, lacks what has ever been lacking in the author's work—sheer fundamental imagination.

The year has been fairly prolific in what may be called "popularities." The chief of these in popularity is Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler's A Double Thread (in its fiftieth thousand), a novel with an astonishingly silly plot, but possessing an ebullient froth of smartness which is moderately agreeable and never tedious. Mr. Richard Whiteing's No. 5, John Street made a furore. It is decidedly more than a "popularity"; its mere cleverness is astonishing, and it is well-imagined in parts; but on the whole more intellectual and alertly philosophic than anything else, and the work of a man who might perhaps find expression equally well in another medium than fiction. Miss Cholmondeley's Red Pottage is at the moment in the eye of the public, and need not be discussed; let us only note that it shows a genuine talent. Miss Beatrice Harraden's The Fowler has sold very well, but Ships that Pass in the Night still remains in a metre by itself, absolutely superior to any of her later books. Mr. Egerton Castle's Young April has had an immediate success, and will increase his renown as an author who can please the indiscriminating without annoying the discriminating.

We began by the year a year of promise. Let us now state the grounds and enumerate very briefly those novels by writers not yet famous which stay in the memory as works of true artistic distinction. The first is undoubtedly "Zack's" On Trial. We regard this as one of the finest novels of the year. Abundantly inspired, and packed with the results of a deep and eclectic observation, it could only have been written by an author of rich and individual talent. "Zack," if she continues to advance, cannot fail soon to occupy a place in the front rank of living novelists. On Trial is by a woman, and about Devonshire. We will put with it another novel—also by a woman and about Devonshire—"George Ford's" Postle Farm. This book did not attract much attention. Nevertheless, though it is not on the same high plane as On Trial, it has pages of real beauty, and "George Ford's" name must be borne in mind. Miss Anne Sedgwick's Confounding of Camellia is that rare thing, a bright novel of domesticity, and Mrs. Wilfrid Ward's One Poor Scruple is the same, with an added touch of the philosophic spirit of Mrs. Humphry Ward. Both stand out distinct from their class. Mr. Clarence Rook's Hooligan Nights is the work of one who can really write. Mr. Rook also has humour and reticence. Miss Pendered's An Englishman has sincerity, observation, wider and more exact than the average, and a certain simple, striking beauty of its own. Mr. Thomas Pinkerton's Dead Oppressors is almost a notable novel; it has wit and individuality, and a fair share of imagination.

Lastly, we must mention a few novels which it is impossible to group or classify, but which, for very varied reasons, have held the public attention. Tolstoi's Resurrection is still under repair. Two of d'Annunzio's novels, The Victim and The Virgins of the Rocks, have been translated: the one has the beauty of sinister horror, the other the beauty of exquisite decay; one is repellent, the other full of melancholy charm. Mr. Mallock's The Individualist is amusing, but biassed in its causticity. Father Barry's The Two Standards, though too long and episodic, is richly coloured and variously suggestive, and more than enough to show that The New Antigone was no chance success. Lever's Gerald Fitzgerald, rescued from an old magazine, proved to be a sound historical romance. Lastly, two established writers, one of whom had been silent for some time, each furnished a dignified and agreeable work—Miss Broughton The Game and the Candle, and Sir Walter Besant The Orange Girl.

Some Younger Reputations.*

Mr. C. F. Keary.

MR. KEARY is a scholar as well as a novelist, but he is known to the world as a novelist. He has published five novels, A Mariage de Convenance (of which a fourth edition was issued some months ago), The Two Lancrofts, Herbert Vanlennert, A Wanderer, and The Journalist, which came out last year. Of these, the first—may Mr. Keary forgive us for saying so!—is probably the best. It is a peculiarity of his novels that they raise questions of technique—questions, perhaps, of more importance to his fellow-craftsmen than to the general reader, but nevertheless

* The following "Younger Reputations" have already been considered in the ACADEMY:

DEC. 4, 1897.—Mr. W. B. Yeats, Mr. George Gissing, Mr. Anthony Hope, Mr. John Davidson, Mr. Henry Seton Merriman, Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch, Mr. Owen Seaman, Mr. H. G. Wells, Mr. Stephen Phillips, Mr. Charles Whibley, Mr. Arthur Morrison, Mr. Kenneth Grahame, Mr. Robert Hichens, Mr. Barry Pain, Mr. G. W. Steevens, Miss Winifred Lucas, Mr. Max Beerbohm, Mr. G. S. Street, Mr. Laurence Housman, Mr. W. W. Jacobs, Mr. A. C. Benson, Mr. H. D. Lowry.

DEC. 11, 1897.—Mrs. Hinkson, Mr. Richard Le Gallienne, Mr. Pett Ridge.

DEC. 18, 1897.—Mr. Walter Raleigh, Mr. H. B. Marriott-Watson.

DEC. 10, 1898.—"C. F. Raimond," Mr. Maurice Hewlett, Mr. Neil Munro, Mr. Eden Phillpotts, Miss Gertrude Atherton.

DEC. 17, 1898.—Mr. Allan Monkhouse, Mr. Bernard Capes.

DEC. 24, 1898.—"George Paston," "Zack."

DEC. 31, 1898.—Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler.

interesting enough. This is especially true of A Mariage de Convenance (1889). In A Mariage de Convenance Mr. Keary, defying a rule which modern novelists, profiting by the thousand failures of their predecessors, have made for themselves, puts his narrative in the form of letters from one character to another. Even in the old days, when verisimilitude had not been invented, and the author made no attempt to write realistic letters, the enormous technical difficulty of epistolary fiction was sufficiently apparent. Mr. Keary, with astonishing dexterity, has made his letters realistic. They are not merely compositions beginning "Dear So-and-So" and ending "Yours ever"; they are letters, precisely such as might have been written under the given circumstances. Imagine, therefore, the tour de force of sheer skill necessary to even a partial success. And Mr. Keary's success is more than partial; it is entire, it is brilliant. Hindered by the seventy-and-seven disadvantages inevitable to this form, and helped forward only by the one poor solitary advantage—namely, that the same incident may be recounted twice from different points of view—he presents a tragedy with moving impressiveness and lifts the utterly commonplace into distinction. The feat was remarkable.

And Mr. Keary has never surpassed it. Herbert Vanlennert (1895) is a voluminous and ambitious work, dealing with a crowd of characters, and elaborate to the last degree. We remember that the Pall Mall Gazette printed a laudatory and discerning review of it under the title, "A Novel by a Novelist," doubtless meaning to distinguish it from the ruck of amateurism. It deserved to be so distinguished, but we should prefer to call it "a novel by an observer." A chief essential of a fine novel is form, and form this book decidedly has not. It is a mass of painstaking and highly-intelligent observation—a mass, amorphous and unwieldy. Between its covers a fine novel may be hidden, just as a fine statue may be hidden in a block of marble, but Mr. Keary happens not to have chiselled it out. Our analogy is lame, as are all analogies which confound the terms of two separate arts; however, it will serve.

In The Journalist Mr. Keary, for the third or fourth time, pursued new tactics. Using a much smaller canvas, and selecting his material with the most searching care, he aimed in this instance at subtlety, and, en route, at certain new effects of realism. One of these latter is a much stricter realism of dialogue than is usual; the attempt was very pretty, but we think there can be no doubt that it failed; the intention was plain, the effect was a bewilderment. As for the subtlety, we admit that Mr. Keary has grappled with a moral and mental situation—designed to show the influence of a woman upon a particular masculine temperament—whose subtlety simply makes the brain reel, so elusive is it. And we deem it probable that those readers who studied The Journalist as a student studies an advanced text-book have seen eye to eye with the author and received the impression which he set out to convey. But a novelist may make a too exacting demand upon the reader, and Mr. Keary has made that demand. The intellectual game is not worth the imaginative candle.

In our view The Journalist, considered artistically, is a failure, just as Herbert Vanlennert is a failure; in both instances the fundamental imagination, though strong, is not equal to the exceptional strain which Mr. Keary puts upon it. But we like Mr. Keary for his failures. They are more interesting than the successes of most people. He is an artist; he has style; he observes; he is in close touch with life; his courage is high. When he fails he fails nobly. And he does not always fail.

Miss Mary Cholmondeley.

MISS CHOLMONDELEY is one of the fortunate few for whom the gates of success have opened wide almost at the first knock. Four novels stand to her name, Sir Charles Danvers, The Danvers Jewels, Diana Tempest, and Red Pottage; and already her position in the literary market is absolutely assured. The success of Red Pottage, to which we referred at length in a recent article, has been one of the most striking phenomena of the past year. But though Red Pottage is her most popular, we do not regard it as her best or her most typical book. That place must be given to Diana Tempest. Miss Cholmondeley has two rather distinct faculties—not often united—the faculty of telling an exciting story, and the faculty of wittily observing character. In Diana Tempest neither of these faculties is allowed to interfere with the other. The reader is consistently kept on tenter hooks concerning the safety of the hero's life from his mysterious trackers, and at the same time the author's power of witty and even humorous observation is maintained in full play. And there is more than wit and more than excitements in Diana Tempest; genuine imagination has gone to the fashioning of the figure of the heroine; Diana is a charming and authentic creation. For the rest, you may observe in Diana Tempest some of the faults of exaggeration and incongruity which, to our thinking, are emphasised in Red Pottage. Miss Cholmondeley suffers from no lack of inspiration, and though she views the world with certain easily-defined social prejudices, her sense of the ridiculous will save her from that narrowness into which only too many novelists—especially women-novelists—have fallen step by step while catering for a large audience. The risk which she runs—and it is a serious one—lies in her apparent contempt for the value of form in art. None of her novels is well constructed, and at least one of them is notably weak in that regard. Moreover, she seems to have little ear for the music of words, or feeling for the dignity of the English tongue. Instances by the score might be brought forward, but this is scarcely the moment for them. We merely refer to them in passing. Gifted with plenty of invention, plenty of wit, some humour, some imagination, and a fresh touch of originality which lends allurements to everything she writes, Miss Cholmondeley has an excellent chance of taking rank with the novelists whose work is worthy of serious consideration and serious praise. It is greatly in her favour that she imitates no one. She has her own plots, her own manner, and, in a certain degree, her own attitude towards life. Lastly, it is to be noted that she is a novelist first and last, and probably well content so to be. She does not glitter on the forehead of the popular magazines, and she is not given over either to interviews or paragraphs. When she publishes a book, then you hear of her; not at other times.

Mr. R. Murray Gilchrist.

MR. GILCHRIST has made an average of one book a year during the last seven years or so. Most of these volumes are quite small; the largest scarcely exceeds sixty thousand words; and at least two novels have been issued during the present year, each of which equals in bulk the whole of Mr. Gilchrist's production. Nevertheless, he has already established himself as a specialist in fiction. His specialities are, first, the short story, and, second, the Peak District of Derbyshire. Mr. Gilchrist began by specialising as a short-story writer, and then, refining upon that, became a short-story writer of the Peak. As such he is now definitively known. It was in 1894 that The Stone Dragon, and Other Tragic Romances, first gave his name a vogue among those people who happen to be interested in literary phenomena. The Stone Dragon has nothing whatever to do with the Peak. It is a collection of stories laid, for the most part, in a conventionalised eighteenth century, but really depending very little upon any sort of local colour. The tales rely for their success upon a fundamental power of imagination moving amid primal passions, and they do not rely in vain. The book is sinister, enveloped in gloom—yes, and decadent (like much fine literature); but it is strong, it has authenticity; the effect sought is the effect won. There is nothing quite like The Stone Dragon in modern English fiction; but in it you may distinctly trace the influence of Poe, and perhaps also of Villiers de l'Isle Adam and Charles Baudelaire. Indeed, if there is a man who could catch and cage the spirit of Fleurs du Mal in our Saxon tongue, it is the author of The Stone Dragon. The titular story in the volume, and "The Writings of Althea Swarthmoor" and "The Noble Courtesan," must take a high place in the literature of the passionate-fantastic. Mr. Gilchrist has never done better work, or more individual.

All his subsequent books, if we mistake not, are exclusively "Peak." Chief among them are A Peakland Faggot, and Nicholas and Mary (issued only a few weeks ago), containing between them some thirty-three short stories. These tales show several striking characteristics—meticulous attention to form, minute knowledge of the district and the rural folk described, utter simplicity of plot and narration, and extreme brevity. Mr. Gilchrist is a hater of verbiage, and one of the few who have realised that style consists not in the apt and generous use of adjectival epithets. His favourite length for a story is two thousand words. As for matter, an incident will usually suffice him, and that of the slightest. Probably the most impressive tale in the two volumes is "A Strolling Player," the first item in A Peakland Faggot. It describes how a poor woman happened upon the house of an aged couple whose daughter had just died in shame, and how she (who had her own tearful history) remained permanently to take the place of that daughter. A dozen small pages—but the result is notable; seriously notable. The night journey of the corpse across the heath, the vigil, the funeral: these things remain; they have atmosphere; they are individual art. One point specially deserving of notice is that Mr. Gilchrist never uses the literary conjuring tricks of the average professional story-teller. His creed is not that the end justifies the means. To be natural is his first care—to set down quite simply and quite honestly what he sees. The ultimate effect must look after itself. If it comes, it comes. If it doesn't, that, in Mr. Gilchrist's eyes, is no justification for going out and dragging it in by the scruff of the neck. Sometimes it doesn't come, and in these cases we certainly think that Mr. Gilchrist has been too cavalier in his disdain of it. His tendency is to make his tales too short. Take, for example, the climax of "Lucretia at the Cabal House," in Nicholas and Mary. Here the culminating scene (p. 94), to which all else is preliminary, is disposed of in a paragraph of sixty words.

Mr. Gilchrist's little novel, The Rue Bargain, is in precisely the vein of his Peak tales, and shows their characteristics, perhaps, even intensified. It is, strictly, a beautiful book; but we should call it a short story disguised, despite the multiplicity of incident. It is an affair of a climax; that climax occurs in Chapter XIX., and not till then does the author open his shoulders and give play to imaginative passion. Mr. Gilchrist may or may not in the future write a long novel which is a novel and nothing else; but we may express the hope that he will never abandon the short-story form.

Mr. A. E. W. Mason.

It seems to have been the special mission of Mr. Mason to prove, in spite of repeated statements to the contrary from people of importance, that the existing convention of historical fiction—created by Scott, and recently brought out and refurbished by Mr. Stanley Weyman—is not yet exhausted. Exactly at the moment when funeral orations were being preached over this convention, Mr. Mason published The Courtship of Morris Buckler, and the book was a shining success. The public had, indeed, been prepared for something good by A Romance of Wastdale, which preceded the more famous story by a year or two, and itself showed promise. The Courtship of Morris Buckler appeared in February, 1896; went through four considerable editions in six months; and last year, having attained the dignity of a sixpenny reprint, stepped definitely into the first rank of modern historical novels, and became a "classic of the decade." It is not after all, as a matter of fact, specially historical in tone, though the time is the seventeenth century, and the action turns upon the Bloody Assize. But, nevertheless, Mr. Mason has adopted most of the sleights and mannerisms of the school in which he ranges himself. Breathless journeys, audacious disguises, cryptic plans, captures, imprisonments, escapes—all the stock devices play their due parts. Mr. Mason, however, has handled them with a fresh and original skill, and there are in his plot several contrivances—the sleep-walking witness to the duel, for instance—which are distinctly his own. The long secret campaign of the heroine against the hero is also a novelty, manipulated with good effect towards the end of the story. Morris Buckler deserved its success. The severest critic cannot but admit that it is the production of a craftsman who has taken pains to make himself the thorough master of his craft. In mere invention it is ingenious, and the style, if never inspired, is immaculately correct—which can be said of few popular novels of the day.

During the present year Mr. Mason has produced two novels. With Miranda of the Balcony we deal on another page. It will be sufficient to note here that this book is a temporary departure from the historical vein, and that in a literary sense it is far more ambitious than any other of the author's books. The second volume is The Watchers, being "Arrowsmith's Christmas Annual" for 1899. Mr. Arrowsmith's Annual, by the way, is an institution, and to have been commissioned to write it gives a certain distinction to a young writer. The Watchers, the scene of which varies between London and the Cornish coasts in the eighteenth century, is frankly a novel of thrills. In it Mr. Mason has used over again, in a modified form, certain of his old effects, and mesmerism and other supernatural mysteries have a share in the movement of the tale. As a piece of excitement, The Watchers is probably equal to anything that Mr. Mason has done. Viewed in other aspects, it is only slightly inferior to Miranda, and the opening scene of drunken revelry at Lieutenant Clutterbuck's is a literary tour de force.

Mr. Mason's work seems to us to be already mature. We doubt if he will ever notably improve on his present achievement. It should be his legitimate pride, however, that he can "tell a tale" with any modern, and that in acquiring a good technical equipment he has spared no trouble to put his native talent to the best possible use.

Mr. F. T. Bullen.

MR. BULLEN has this advantage over the ordinary literary man, that he has an active life at the back of him. He is remembering emotion in tranquillity; having first done, he is now recording. And this life is one of the most interesting and wonderful that a man can have, for it was spent largely in the tropics, in the midst of strange seas, under unfamiliar stars in foreign harbours, at the helm of wandering ships. Mr. Bullen has seen with his own eyes the things which most writing men have only heard of: he has seen terrific storms and paralysing calms, he has seen a boat cut in two by a stroke of a dying cachalot's tail, he has seen a cuttle fish and whale in a deadly struggle, he has seen murder, he has seen the East. Given such experiences and a small capacity to narrate, and something readable must come of it. Mr. Bullen has much more than a small capacity; but we want to point out clearly that the principal value of his work is his career. He must not be classed with such a fine imaginative artist as Mr. Conrad, whose Nigger of the "Narcissus" is beyond him altogether. Mr. Bullen, in his Log of a Sea Waif, does, indeed, play with part of Mr. Conrad's theme—the terrors of a gale which, it would seem, is to be appeased and pacified only by a human sacrifice; but he does it simply as a sincere reporter. Mr. Conrad's inner fire is a thing apart. Nor is Mr. Bullen another Michael Scott—he lacks that robust temperament; nor another Marryat—he has not the humour; nor another Melville—he is without the dramatic force. But he supplements them all by the virtue of lacking these qualities and because, in their place, he possesses a power of careful, patient description, a gift of close observation, an eye for natural beauty, a reverence for human goodness, a tenacious memory, and, above all, the desire to be truthful. A man who has seen men and things and desires to pass on his impressions uninjured will command attention. Mr. Bullen's sincerity, his straightforwardness, his humility as an atom in a tremendous and venerable scheme, all make for the acceptability of his writings. We can believe him. His danger, as with all writers who live on the past, is that he will exhaust his material and repeat effects. Already we detect an inclination towards sheer writing, or polysyllabic padding, which he was once not guilty of. Our advice to him is in every way to strive after new experiences and to make each word do its work as far as possible unaided. At his best, as in parts of The Cruise of the "Cachalot," and "Running the Easting Down," in Idylls of the Sea, he is one of the best reporters of ocean life and ocean raptures that a landsman can ask.

The Amateur Critic.

[To this page we invite our readers to contribute criticism, favourable or otherwise, of books new and old, or remarks on striking or curious passages which they may meet with in their reading. No communication, we would point out, must exceed 300 words.]

Wanted: Novels of Observation.

A RECENT "Amateur Critic" touched lightly upon the possibility that "the life of a great drapery establishment" might form the theme of a successful novel of observation.

There are two great difficulties in the way of the production of a work dealing with the life of the draper. In the first place, so crushing is the effect of the drapery trade upon the soul and intellect of all concerned in it, that no such work can be expected from an employé. What is wanted, then, is a capable novelist to sink himself in the drapery slough for two years at the least, to garner material carefully, and (upon his rising) to report the nature of the subsoil with tolerable fidelity.

But the second difficulty intervenes. A novelist is a novelist by reason of a soul more sensitive and a nature more emotional than falls to the lot of most; and I doubt the ability of such a man, good though his will may be, to exist for even a week in the starved atmosphere of the Trade.

These are the difficulties: if they are not thought insuperable, the possibilities are most tempting. The exacting master; the bullying manager; the truckling, prying shopwalker; and the dumb, driven assistant are only a few selections from a mine of untried types. There is a quiet tragedy in the air over all: whether his labours result in the acquisition of less or more money, the unfailing result is the daily intellectual and moral deterioration of the man himself.

Comic relief swarms. Assistants, masters, and customers daily form up for a triangular duel, hating each other with more virulence than do the captain and crew of a tramp steamer, and covering the same by a ghastly, grinning politeness. Thousands of comic anecdotes of customers and salesmen await the gleaner; the life-stories of many of the men are true studies in sordid; and about one in every hundred is a genuine living caricature. Their inner life, their amusements, their proper slang, their sports and dancing classes, are but a few of those points which an artist could touch into gold. This would be no calm "Romance of the Second Cup of Tea," for thirteen hours' work per day gives a hungry zest to the enjoyment of a half-day per week.

Lastly, the love affairs are one magnificent tangle, in and out and all around the establishment. Oh, the tales I could tell!

This work should be written, not in the spirit of the narrow satirist who would call us "ten-shillings-a-week shopboys," and think his duty well performed; not in the spirit of Dickens's Horatio Sparkins; but it should be written in the spirit of broad sympathy by a man who has realised the truth of the dictum, "To understand all is to forgive all."

Two names recommend themselves to me—the first greatly, the second sufficiently—viz., I. Zangwill and Arthur Morrison.

I always fancied that the work should be called "Behind the Shop Fronts."

A SHOPBOY.

Commas, Colons, and Semi-Colons.

SIR WALTER BESANT, in his book The Orange Girl, displays some remarkable peculiarities of punctuation. In the early part of the book hardly a semicolon is to be found; towards the end there is a similar lack of colons; and in the middle colons and semicolons appear to be used indiscriminately. The following extracts (from the second edition) will serve as illustrations:

I could endure the doubt no longer. I laid my arm about her waist: the song was troubled: her eyes dropped. "Oh!" she said. "What wilt thou?" I drew her closer. The song broke off. I kissed her head, her brow, her lips. We said nothing. She sang no more. But the larks began their hymns of joy: the clouds passed: the sun came out in splendour: the hedges seemed all to burst together into blossom. (Page 49.)

When I recovered I was lying along the stone bench: my coat was gone: my waistcoat was gone; my shirt was in rags; my shoes—on which were silver buckles, were gone; and my stockings, which were of black silk. (Page 220.)

Before the house was a flower-garden; at the back was a kitchen-garden and orchard; the house was well and solidly furnished; all round the house lay fields of tobacco on which black people were working; on the steps of the veranda; in the garden; under the trees played in the warm sun the little naked negro children. (Page 434.)

As I understand them, the uses of colons and semicolons are quite distinct. Semicolons are a kind of superior comma; and colons usually either precede a list or a direct speech, or separate a cause from its effect. In the first extract some of the full-stops have no more value than the colons; in the second, the colons and semicolons perform precisely similar offices; and in the third, some of the semicolons should have been commas, while the rest are equivalent to the colons in the first and second extracts.

A writer may, perhaps, be allowed to have his own ideas on the matter of punctuation, provided there is reason in his ideas, but I fancy that no excuse can be found for such careless inconsistencies as are shown in The Orange Girl.

Ford's Lyrics.

IN Prof. Saintsbury's preface to his collection of seventeenth century lyrics, I came across the following statement: "Who has a more apparently lyrical imagination than John Ford? He has not left a single good lyric, and is probably responsible for some very bad ones." Certainly Ford had not the lyrical gift of most of his dramatic contemporaries, but it is hardly just to say he did not write one good lyric. There is a host of Elizabethan lyrics for which the adjective "good" is utterly inadequate; but surely no meaner term could be applied to the following "Dirge," from the closing scene of "The Broken Heart":

Glories, pleasures, pomps, delights, and ease,
Can but please
The outward senses, when the mind
Is or untroubled, or by peace refined.
Crowns may flourish and decay,
Beauties shine but fade away.
Youth may revel, yet it must Lie down in a bed of dust.
Earthly honours flow and waste,
Time alone doth change and last.
Sorrows mingled with contents, prepare
Rest for care;
Love only reigns in death; though art
Can find no comfort for a Broken Heart.

In spite of the epigrammatic abruptness of the concluding couplet, the song, I think, deserves praise. To the student of drama it is a matter for regret that Ford wasted, or at least obscured, tragic powers of a high order, by the adoption of plots so repulsive and unnatural. A quaint portrait of the dramatist, shadowing forth dimly his external appearance, but admirably suggesting his peculiar artistic temperament, is given in the two well-known lines from a contemporary source:

Deep in a dump John Ford was alone got,
With folded arms and melancholy hat.

Wanted, a New Microcosmography.

MR. ISRAEL GOLLANCZ has done well in adding to Messrs. Dent's handy "Temple Classics" series a new edition of Earle's Microcosmography. In this format it is to be hoped that this admirable gallery of seventeenth century character studies will have an extended popularity. Now is the time for some modern Theophrastus to arise and give us a new series of characters of our age. I venture to submit the following titles for some of the word-portraits of modern literary characters: "The Good Authors'-Agent," "The Virtuous Publisher," "A Roaring Journalist," "The Downright Lady-Novelist," "A Very Laureate," "A Mere Dull Contributor," and "A Grub-street Phantastique."

Charles Lamb's Time Sheet.

ALL lovers of Elia will be grateful to Sir Algernon West for recalling in his Recollections the following lines, in which Charles Lamb makes a humorous time-table of his work at the India House:

From ten to eleven
Eat breakfast for seven.
From eleven to noon
Think I've come too soon.
From noon to one
Think what's to be done.
From one to two
Find nothing to do.
From two to three Think it will be
A very great bore
To stay till four.

Things Seen.

Self-Respect.

I HAVE known a man to be sunk many days in a black humour only because he had been worsted before a company in a skirmish of words. I have known a man to walk on air for a week because of a song well sung, or a word well found, or a smart catch at point.

Why, this Sunday morning, three minutes before eight, I was hurrying through a low quarter. The people slept behind close-drawn dingy blinds; rare passengers, on errands like my own, showed morning faces: and among them, slouching along the pavement, I came up with a relic of yesternight, his fifth-hand coat foul from the gutter, his ragged trousers bulging in creases over his down-trodden heels. With his hands thrust deep in his pocket, his shoulders hunched to his ears, which his greasy billycock spread out, he was the very picture of squalid depression, sick with the sourness of last night's beer.

When I was at the point to overhaul him, he paused. One of the little surprises with which the street lies in wait had arrested his attention—his own figure at full length in the window of a draper's shop. I saw his tired, unwholesome face. As he gazed the brow became heavy with thought. His hands were busy about his neck. Over his shoulder, as I passed him, I looked upon his reflection facing me from out the mirror, and I saw—scarlet and blue and yellow beneath his rusty chin—the very popinjay of neckties. It was his one "little bit of all right."

I looked back a moment later, and he was coming on behind me, his shoulders squared, his chest thrown forward—marching.

An Apologue and an Apology.

ONCE upon a time there was a man who asked much of God and Nature and Fate.

And at last, God asked him: "Will you worship Me by faith alone and without question?" And the man answered, "No. I will question. Why else have you given me the power to reason and understand?"

And God turned away.

And then Nature asked him: "Will you be simple, primitive, animal, taking whatever the day gives you with contentment; doing whatever Chance offers you without remorse?" And the man answered: "No; I will not be animal. Why else have my fathers toiled to raise me from the bestial stage to the stature and responsibilities of the human being?"

And Nature turned away.

Last of all Fate asked him, and her offers were the most difficult of all. Fate said to him: "Choose; will you be a student, finding the greatest satisfaction of your life in the range and width of what you know and can think? Or will you be sensitive, emotional, receptive, quickly responsive to every shade and turn of Beauty and Art, very human and very weak?" And the man answered, "I will be both. Why else have I the two natures?"

And Fate laughed.

Then once more Fate asked him, and her brow grew terrible: "Which will you have: the quiet, domestic love as of one whose calm affection endures? or will you for ever seek the mad love, the thing which shifts and changes, which dies and is re-born, now glittering with young passion, and anon shadowed with ancient weariness?" And the man answered: "I will have both: the one for the every day and the other for the holiday. Why else have I the two instincts?"

And Fate spurned him as a fool.

Then the man knew that he was all from all Eternity doomed to fail.

And he cursed God and Nature and Fate.

Favourite Books of 1899.

Some Readers.

THIS year, in accordance with our custom, we have sent to a number of well-known men and women, both literary and practical, a request that they would name the two books which, during the past year, they have read with most interest and pleasure. A large number of replies have already been received, some of which we print below. Others will appear next week.

Mr. THOMAS HARDY.

Letters of Robert and Mrs. Browning.
Yeats's Wind Among the Reeds.

Lord GRIMTHORPE.

Life of Dean Liddell.
S. Butler's Who Wrote the Odyssey?

Dr. STUBBS (Bishop of Oxford).

Concerning Isabel Carnaby.

Mr. ANDREW LANG.

(Serious books not reckoned.)
Martin Ross's Experiences of an Irish R. M.
Eden Phillpotts's The Human Boy.

Mr. J. HENRY SHORTHOUSE.

To the best of my recollection I have only read two new books in 1899, so that I cannot answer your question. My wife and I have read with great delight The Story of a Red Deer, by the Hon. J. W. Fortescue, but this was published in 1897.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE.

A. Hope's The King's Mirror.
A great number of English and foreign books have interested and pleased me in 1899, and I hesitate among them to prefer any one over the others for the second place.

Mr. E. T. COOK (Editor of Daily News).

Mackail's Life of Morris.
Whiteing's No. 5, John Street.

Mr. EDMUND GOSSE.

The book which has interested me most in 1899 is The Letters of R. L. Stevenson; and no other occurs to me as comparable with it.

Sir F. H. JEUNE.

Duchess of Sutherland's One Hour and the Next.
Lecky's Map of Life.

Lady JEUNE.

Duchess of Sutherland's One Hour and the Next.
Winston Churchill's The River War.

Mrs. CRAIGIE ("John Oliver Hobbes").

Edmund Gosse's The Life and Letters of John Donne.
Stephen Phillips's Paolo and Francesca.

Mr. ARTHUR W. PINERO.

Stevenson's Letters.
Mr. Stephen Phillips's Paolo and Francesca.

Mr. HAMO THORNEYCROFT, R.A.

G. Brandes' Critical Study of William Shakespeares.
Stevenson's Letters. Edited by S. Colvin.

Mr. ROBERT HICHENS.

I have read very few new books for some time: scarcely anything but Balzac and Turgenev. I want to put down Cousins Bette and Fathers and Children; but I remember that they are not new, so I cannot put anything. I am so sorry.

Mr. F. ANSTEY.

Miss Cholmondeley's Red Pottage.
Eden Phillpotts's The Human Boy.

Mr. EDWARD CLODD.

Dill's Roman Society in the last Century of the Roman Empire.
Keane's Man, Past and Present.

Mr. OSCAR BROWNING.

Belloc's Life of Danton.
Hodgkin's Italy and her Invaders (vols. vii. and viii.).

Dr. JOSEPH PARKER.

In light literature:
Red Pottage.
Penelope in Scotland.

Mr. JOHN HOLLINGSHEAD.

No new books; two old ones:
Shelley's Queen Mab, privately printed, 1820.
Failed to see why "privately printed" any more than Renan's Jesus.
Post Office London Directory. Wonderful book; history without fiction. Recommend it strongly to the Bishop of London. It will open his eyes to his immense responsibility. Consulted it for addresses.

Mr. MAURICE HEWLETT.

Mr. Gosse's Life and Letters of John Donne: in scope and execution by far the most scholarly book of this and of many years.
Mr. W. B. Yeats's Poems: a small book, but of the essence of poetry.

Mme. SARAH GRAND.

Lecky's The Map of Life.
E. Grubb's Social Aspects of the Quaker Faith.

Miss C. M. YONGE.

Life of Bishop Walsham How.
Like Another Helen.
There is a scarcity of books this year that leave any mark. These seem to me the best.

Miss M. E. BRADDON.

L'Anneau d'Améthyste.
The Fowler.

Prof. SILVANUS P. THOMPSON.

Lecky's Map of Life.
Manual of Electrical Undertakings.

Admiral Sir NOWELL SALMON.

A Diplomatist's Wife in Japan.
The Cruise of the "Cachalot."

Mr. FREDERICK WEDMORE.

Stephen Phillips's Paolo and Francesca.
Lady Lindsay's The Apostle of the Ardennes.

Mr. MICHAEL DAVITT, M.P.

Mr. Justin McCarthy's Reminiscences.
The Transvaal Boer Speaking for Himself.

Mr. CLEMENT SHORTER.

The two most important contributions to English literature during 1899 would seem to me to have been—

Dr. Edward Morris's Studies in Dante.
 Sir George Trevelyan's American Revolution.
The Stevenson Letters and Dr. Knapp's Life of Borrow come next in merit, in my judgment.

Mr. I. ZANGWILL.

Anatole France's L'Anneau d'Améthyste.
 Ernest Seton Thompson's Wild Animals I Have Known.

Mr. W. DAVENPORT ADAMS.

R. L. Stevenson's Letters.
 Mrs. Oliphant's Autobiography.

Mr. ARNOLD WHITE.

Fitzpatrick's The Transvaal from Within.
 Lecky's The Map of Life.

Mr. W. PETT RIDGE.

Difficult to remember the favourites of the early part of 1899, and my present selections bear a recent date. To win or a place:

Bret Harte's Mr. Jack Hamlin's Mediation.
 Arthur Morrison's To London Town.
 Neil Munro's Gilian the Dreamer.

Mr. W. W. JACOBS.

As I have only read one new book this year, wild horses should not tear from me the name of it. I sincerely hope that my dishonourable case is quite exceptional.

The Duration of Copyright.

THE opinions expressed in the last issue of the ACADEMY on the question, "How Long Should Copyright Last?" have at least this merit, they illustrate almost every variety of fallacy it is possible to hold in connexion with the subject of copyright. Mr. Courtney, who thinks perpetual copyright undesirable because a "book is a national possession and should be made accessible to the nation," has overlooked the fact that if any one book can be said to be a "national possession" it is the Bible. Yet the Bible is the subject of perpetual copyright, and is, I understand, fairly accessible. But apart from this, in what sense is any book a "national possession" more than the Lakes of Killarney or Haddon Hall? Yet we allow perpetual rights of possession in their case. We do not ask the owner to make them accessible to the nation; we do not even prevent him if, in the exercise of his right of property, he destroys or defaces that which, once destroyed or defaced, cannot be restored. A book at least, once printed and published, is indestructible. No owner, howsoever careless or malicious, can effect its destruction. Again, why should the Poet Laureate be placed on a different footing from the President of the Royal Academy? What the latter produces is surely as much a "national possession" as what the former produces. I have not heard that Sir Edward Poynter is only allowed to sell his pictures on condition that after a certain time they must be exhibited gratis; or that if the dealer who buys them cannot get rid of them in a limited period he must present them to the nation; or that the artist may not bequeath them to whomsoever he wishes, but is restricted to willing them away to his descendants. One would think the right of property required to be far more stringently regulated in the case of such a delicate, irreplaceable product as a picture than in the case of such a hardy, indestructible product as a book. Will Mr. Courtney champion in the case of art property the restrictions he is so ready to impose upon literary property?

Mr. Hope holds that copyright is not a good form of hereditary property, as it entails neither duties nor responsibility. Were this true it would be irrelevant. What duties or responsibilities are attached to the possession of New Three's or Brighton A's? I believe that nevertheless you may leave stocks and shares to your heirs and assigns (even where they do not happen to be your descendants), in the comfortable certainty that the State will not confiscate them thirty years after your death. But, as a matter of fact, Mr. Hope's contention is the very reverse of the truth. There is no description of property which involves such delicate questions of duty and responsibility as does literary property. You possess the standard exposition of ethical, philosophical, or scientific doctrine; it is riddled by the progress of knowledge and speculation; what should be your attitude? No; had Mr. Hope contended that the duties and responsibilities of literary property were too great and too manifold to be perpetually associated with financial considerations, I could understand him; but as it is—

Mr. Rider Haggard has a touching belief in the longevity of authors. Have the works of Keats, Shelley, Stevenson, and Aubrey Beardsley enjoyed a copyright of "at least sixty years"? Surely the work of the genius consumed by his intense flame is as entitled to protection as that of the comfortable Philistine who makes a good bargain with the insurance office?

In this steeplechase of disastrous paradox Mr. Frederic Harrison comes in an easy first. "In my opinion the proper period for the duration of literary copyright should be seven years." C'est monumental! Let me cite a couple of instances to show how it would work. In the case of the New English Dictionary and of the Dictionary of National Biography it may safely be asserted that expenses of organisation, payment of workers, correction of proofs, extend to 70 per cent., leaving 30 per cent. for the actual cost of print, paper, and binding. After seven years, Jack, Tom and Harry are to step in and confiscate the 70 per cent. of the actual outlay, and, what is more, the courage, the knowledge, the attainments which have made these great undertakings possible. We know that Mr. Harrison loves knowledge and letters, yet he would condemn all serious literature to extinction save in the rare event of a wealthy author or an enlightened patron. It is charitable to assume that he did not give one moment's consideration to what he was writing.

Dr. Furnivall and Mr. Shaw cite the analogy of patent rights. It will not hold water for one moment, and if it did it would simply prove that patentees were badly treated. But articles of consumption and utility, such as form the subject of the vast mass of patents—articles which, if required at all, are required in large numbers and must be bought—cannot be compared with books the first sale of which, one may almost say, varies in inverse ratio to their merit, and is always handicapped by the fact that the book can easily be lent, and that the producer is compelled to give away copies which, not impossibly, may meet the entire demand for a time.

There exists no valid reason why literary property should be treated differently from any other kind of property. Mr. Shaw is shocked at the idea of the heirs of John Bunyan "wallowing idly in royalties" because their ancestor was a man of genius. Mr. Shaw would be equally shocked at the idea of the Duke of Westminster "wallowing idly in rents" derived from the lucky land speculations of his ancestors, or of the Gould family "wallowing idly in dividends" because their ancestor rigged the market early and often. But Mr. Harrison, Mr. Courtney, Mr. Hope, and the community at large, do not share Mr. Shaw's faith. The socialist is at least consistent; the non-socialistic community is grotesquely inconsistent. Owners of articles of value, articles which the public wants and for which it is willing to pay, whether the article be land, or food, or dress, or an art product of whatever kind—literary, plastic, pictorial, or musical—should all be placed on the same level, and have the same rights as regards the use and enjoyment of their property. We do not apply this principle to literature. Why? Not because we regard it as a "national possession," but because we have hardly learned to regard it as a possession at all; not because we have such a lofty idea of its nature that it must be kept free from degrading financial considerations, but because we have such a poor and mean idea of its worth that we cannot make up our minds to treat it in the same way as any other article of value we really appreciate and really want.

ALFRED NUTT.

Memoirs of the Moment.

THE sons of the clergy are popularly supposed to be a somewhat inept class as money-getters. Yet Mr. Cecil Rhodes and Sir Henry Tate, multi-millionaires both of them, were both boys in rectories, nurtured on other-worldliness. Of the chance by which Sir Henry made the great fortune from cube-sugar something has been said in the obituary notices published this week; but to the lucky adoption of an invention, refused by others of less discernment, he added a long head for business and a persistent industry. Londoners, who saw him only or mainly as the Cæsar who bought pictures, still found in him the shrewd speech of one who knew his own practical mind. When the white-haired old gentleman, bent yet alert of figure, came to a private view a sort of hush of expectation fell among artists. To you they might talk; but out a corner of their eyes their minds were all the time intent on him, and on the picture he appeared to pause before, lest haply it should be one of theirs. In that quest he put aside minor admirations; and, good-natured as he was, resisted even the subtle temptation to play the patron of the young artist with his fame still before him.

MR. TATE felt certain of Millais, and bought him seven times; once to good purpose indeed—when he became the owner of "Ophelia." "The Vale of Rest" in the Tate Gallery is but a reminiscence of the best work of Millais's pre-Raphaelite period—the period to which the painter himself perversely looked back with distrust, just as Mr. Ruskin has often, when talking to friends, denounced those early writings of his as "rubbish." These and the other examples Sir Henry Tate bought of this master he probably took at the painter's strangely inverted valuation. What he bought he bought straightforwardly, modestly in manner if not in purse, and on intelligible business principles. The nation, which was in many instances the gainer, has no cause to quarrel with his decisions, and the Gallery which bears his name, if a little far away from most people, is no doubt conveniently situated for somebody. There, at any rate, where the Chantrey Bequest purchases are to be seen, it can never be said that the mere layman from Liverpool could not buy as discerningly as a picked body of artists. The really poor pictures on those walls, the pictures which make the gallery a place of depression and gloom to many visitors, are the Chantrey purchases, not his. Sir Henry, who is succeeded by a son already nearly sixty, took a keen interest in the Gallery to the very end, and never regretted the half-hour's talk he had with Sir William Harcourt which resulted in his final agreement to spend some three-quarters of a million upon a palace of Art and its contents.

MR. R. BOSWORTH SMITH sends an appreciation of Miss Anna Swanwick. Coming from "a friend of many years of this most charming and talented old lady," it carries with it on every personal ground far more weight than attached to the light and passing record made here by a comparative stranger, who meant to say none but friendly, if critical, words..

"Didactic" [he says] is the very last word which anyone who was capable of appreciating Miss Anna Swanwick's delightful conversation would think of applying to it. If it was "conversation" in any true sense of the word at all, it could not be "didactic"; and if it was "didactic" it could not be really delightful. It was sustained, suggestive, brilliant, original; but it was also simple, sympathetic, reciprocal. She put everyone at his ease in a moment, and she talked at least as much upon subjects suggested by her friends as she did upon those started by herself. Its charm, indeed, defied analysis. She put the whole tenderness and variety and purity of her character into it. No one ever came away from a lengthened talk with her without feeling himself strengthened, elevated, refined, humbled by it. If he did, it was his own, not her fault.

And so of her style as a translator of Æschylus, as to which it is not unreasonable to expect a large variety of opinions; and so, too, of her style as a letter-writer to her intimates, of which we never had an opportunity of offering an opinion, and very willingly record Mr. Bosworth Smith's. "Speaking for myself," he says, "there is not one of the many letters of hers which I possess which, alike for the beauty of their expression and the depth of their sympathy, I shall not treasure while life may last." To make an end, Dr. Martineau said of this lady to Mr. Bosworth Smith: "She was the noblest woman I have ever known." Let that be her epitaph.

THE ill-luck of the Morning Post in the matter of war correspondents does not lie wholly with the gods. Let them take their due responsibility for the shutting up of Mr. Stuart in Ladysmith, and even for the bullet at Graspan which has cost Mr. Knight his arm. But Mr. Winston Churchill, from the newspaper point of view, was distinctly tempting Providence when he went out with the armoured train as a combatant, and Wellington-street has been a little perturbed in consequence. The simple fact is, that Mr. Churchill as a non-combatant placed himself in a very awkward position if any of the enemy fell before him. He is not on the strength of the Army, and he has no right to kill. However, the gentle Boer has not raised that point, but has treated him as an authorised fighter, and so has sent him to Pretoria as a prisoner of war. Had he not fought he would have been at once released, and his excellent pen would to-day have been at the service of his employers.

A PAPER without a correspondent could not do better than cable its instructions to Lieut. Maxwell-Scott, whose account of the Battle of Reitfontein, contained in a letter to his father, is excellent. It is a very candid letter, for the young lieutenant, who was with the Gloucesters, confesses that his "first feeling was funk" when he found himself peppered upon by the Boers. Sir George White had sent the Gloucesters out from Ladysmith at three in the morning on a long march, during which the Gloucesters lost touch of any staff-officer. The result was that they went nearer to the Boer lines than they had any need to do, and found their mistake when their own artillery opened fire behind them to the jeopardy of their lives. The chaplain ran back to stop the firing, and if he swore, as the lieutenant says, his bishop has a pardon ready for him. Then the Gloucesters got back within cover of their own lines, but not till "poor Colonel Wilford" had been shot in the back of the head. Lieut. Maxwell-Scott, by the way, is the great-great grandson of Sir Walter, and the heir of Abbotsford.

Correspondence.

Mr. G. A. Henty's Books.

SIR,—I regret much being obliged to ask you to insert another communication from me; but I am compelled to do so in consequence of the letter of Messrs. Partridge. The correspondence referred to by me took place last March; and as I had thought no more of the matter until I saw the book under a changed name a month since, I concluded, mistakenly, that it was its publishers who had, eight months before, written to me, whereas it was, in fact, Messrs. White. I explained to Messrs. Partridge's representative how my error had arisen, and said that I considered that it had resulted entirely from their own want of courtesy in not having written to me to ascertain my view as to the change of name—a want of courtesy all the more singular inasmuch as they had previously published some of my short stories. As they have, in their letter to you, made no allusion whatever to this view of the case, but have left it to be supposed that I had gratuitously brought a false accusation against them, I shall be greatly obliged if you will insert this explanation. Thanking you in advance for your courtesy, on which I promise to make no further demands,—I am, &c., G. A. HENTY.

Clapham Common, S.W.: Dec. 4, 1899.

The Late Mr. Henry Vaughan.

SIR,—I think that your statement respecting the late Mr. Henry Vaughan needs a slight alteration in one place. You state that he was not a clubman; but your correspondent would have found him at the Burlington Fine Arts Club almost every day of his life when he was in England had he inquired for him. Mr. Vaughan was the father of this club, and devoted to its interests in every way. He knew all its history, and was never tired of talking of its exhibitions. By the various members of the club he was looked upon as the final court of appeal upon many questions, as his knowledge was not only so varied, but so marvellously accurate. As a connoisseur he represented the old school—the Bernal school or the Walpole school—and there is hardly anyone left to take his place. With regard to drawings, either by the old masters or by Turner, Hunt, Cox, Constable, or Fielding, all the members of the club sat at Henry Vaughan's feet; and yet, with all his wonderful knowledge and accuracy of judgment, he was the most modest of men, and was always desirous of hearing the opinion of others. He will be sadly missed here, and the drawing-room will hardly seem the same without his familiar figure. For years he has sat in the same chair, and enjoyed evening after evening a cup of tea and an eager conversation with his old friends in the club.—I am, &c., G. C. WILLIAMSON.

The Burlington Fine Arts Club,
17, Savile-row, W.: Dec. 3, 1899.

"As Idle as a Painted Ship."

SIR,—In connexion with the above, I do not think that the one utterly wrong and ludicrous line in Coleridge's masterpiece has ever before been pointed out. It is—"The steersman's face by his lamp gleam'd white." Imagine the expressions that would be used by a British mariner told to take his trick at the helm of a motionless vessel!—I am, &c.,

Bangor, N. Wales:
Dec. 2, 1899.

THOMAS PINKERTON.

Dr. Johnson and Shakespeare,

SIR,—A few weeks ago you offered a prize of one guinea to the reader who sent you the finest scene, in a few lines, from any English poet. The prize was awarded to a gentleman who sent up the description of Dover Cliff from "King Lear." But Dr. Johnson would have challenged your decision, as you may see from the following extract taken from "Boswell":

Johnson said that the description of the temple in "The Mourning Bride" was the finest poetical passage he had ever read; he recollected none in Shakespeare equal to it. . . . Someone mentioned the description of Dover Cliff.—Johnson: "No, sir; it should be all precipice—all vacuum. The crows impede your fall. The diminished appearance of the boats and other circumstances are all very good description; but do not impress the mind at once with the horrible idea of immense height. The impression is divided; you pass on by computation from one stage of the tremendous space to another. Had the girl in 'The Mourning Bride' said she could not cast her shoe to the top of one of the pillars in the temple, it would not have aided the idea, but weakened it."

The passage preferred by Johnson runs:

How reverend is the face of this tall pile,
Whose ancient pillars rear their marble heads,
To bear aloft its arch'd and ponderous roof,
By its own weight made steadfast and unmovable,
Looking tranquillity. It strikes an awe
And terror on my aching sight.

Although we no longer take Johnson seriously as a critic, yet I thought his choice might be of interest to some of your readers.—I am, &c., J. W. FEAVER.

South Norwood: Dec. 5, 1899.

[Mr. Feaver's criticism is interesting, and we are glad to have it; but he misses the point of our competition. Our competitors were not asked to supply the finest scene in eight lines, but the most vivid pictorial passage. Dr. Johnson's remarks do not impair the vivid pictorial quality of Shakespeare's description of the prospect from the cliff.—ED. ACADEMY.]

Our Prize Competitions.

Result of No. 11 (New Series).

IN response to our requests for abstracts of imaginary newly-discovered Christmas stories by Charles Dickens, we have received several interesting replies. The best we think to be this, by Mr. S. Wellwood, Merrylea Park, Cathcart:

I have just read The Cropplestowes, a Christmas story without a single ghost, by Charles Dickens. Roger Cropplestow is a young man of fortune, whose father gradually becomes a victim to the hallucination that his wealth has dwindled to a few hundred pounds, and actually insists upon starting a small haberdashery business in Ribbon-lane. Crinkle, the family lawyer—snuffy and sagacious, with head on one side and, to balance matters, nose on the other—advises Roger to humour the old man, who sleeps in the back shop. Roger, who is a trifle rollicking, but a good soul, gives a bachelor party to a select company of bosom friends on Christmas evening. By the way, what a fine old crusted piece of Dickensian characterisation is Bunderby, the footman, with his ponderous "Sir, Mr. Roger is in—Mr. Roger is in, sir"; and his stockings—"so full of his calves that they seemed at a perpetual bursting-point!" Delightful, also, is the elegant Mr. Swick, the butler, epigrammatist and master of metaphors, in love with the cook, who bears the lovely patronymic of Violet Squiggs. "To say Violet," says Mr. Swick, "is to put the tongue in heaven; and Squiggs—why, that rounds it huff like a tail to a kite!" In the height of the evening Bunderby whispers in Roger's ear, "Sir, there's a hold ragged man at the door, sir; and I rayther think, sir, he's your—ahem—father, sir." Roger, excusing himself, goes out, meets his father, and conducts him to a distant room. "I drew thirty shillings to-day, my boy," chuckles the old man. "Thirty shillings, eh! Look a bit of a pauper, eh!—not come to that yet, though. I put on these old things to be able to buy remnants cheap—ha! ha! Waa'n't charged for my appearance—ha!—heavens! was that a champagne cork? We're ruined—we're ruined!" and he sinks into a chair with a most pathetic melancholy. Then his eyes light on a picture on the wall—his wife's portrait. By chance they are in her room, left untouched after her death, since when he had not crossed its threshold

At first he gazes at the image of the dead lady with childish curiosity, then with swiftly gathering memories, till at last he comes to himself, and, with a sob, turns and shakes hands with his son. Roger, with delight and tears in his eyes, pushes his father into the supper room, rags and all, and—"never was Christmas party like it!"

Unfortunately, however, Mr. Wellwood transgresses our rule limiting the abstract to 250 words. We therefore award the prize to Mr. Arthur S. Megaw, The Prairie, Holywood, co. Down, for the following:

I have been reading Goodwill. It is delightful—a Christmas story with the old Christmas spirit, and told as only Dickens could tell it. These new acquaintances are old friends of mine already. First, there is Mr. Fizzlekins—always merry, in spite of his affliction: a dreadfully enlarged foot. It is always brimming over with good humour. He is generous to a fault. We are shocked, but not surprised, when we see how he is victimised by that fascinating rascal, Captain Fitzbottleaxe. One can't help liking Mrs Partridge (plump and rosy and indefatigable), but I do think she might have been less hard on poor Anna Maria. Still, in spite of her arrangements (she is always "making arrangements"), she could not prevent Anna Maria marrying Tom Smiley. And with what art does she pretend she had been in favour of Tom all the time! And then the Christmas party! With what good things is the table heaped! What singing of songs and cracking of jokes! How pretty Anna Maria looks! How imperious and comfortable Mrs. Partridge! How proud she is of her "arrangements"! Old Fizzlekins positively bubbles over with good humour. How infectious is their happiness! Even Silas Juniper forgets his sombre trade of low comedy, and his wrinkled and weatherbeaten countenance relaxes and beams with joy. How pleased we are to be present at the party!

Other abstracts follow:

I think The Spirit of the Steeple is a capital little Christmas story. I like the weird description in the first chapter of the stern, disappointed old man Croatch, wandering about on that Christmas eve at midnight, restless and unhappy, thinking he hears the voice of his banished son calling to him from the steeple, and followed by his faithful clerk, Wornum, trembling and fearful. Is not the Christmas dinner at the Nucklemoons delightful? What merriment when the guests find considerable difficulty in squeezing into the dining-room, and honest, cheery Tom Nucklemoon declares that there is plenty of room—too much, in fact; and Mr. Frodlock and Frank Podgreen share a chair between them; and several little Nucklemoons are tucked under the sideboard; and plump Mrs Nucklemoon, in pink ribbons, sits glowing with pleasure as 'Melie Crabbe comes in, with flushed cheeks and creaking shoes, staggering under the weight of the hugest of puddings! What screams of delight from the small Nucklemoons! Even old Sharples, the lawyer, forgets to snarl, and pours out another glass of sherry for Mrs. Melldew. But the reconciliation between old Croatch and his son is perhaps Dickens at his best. So skilfully is this scene penned that it seems the most likely thing in the world that father and son should meet on that Christmas morning in the churchyard under the shadow of the steeple, that all should be forgiven, and that in consequence everyone should be made happier, especially the faithful Wornum.

[E. S. H., Bradford]

Of course this little story appears as "born out of due time." Yet if you can accept the good old Dickens convention it will set you glowing and tingling with contentment for at least two hours. Chirky is a distinct gain to the Dickens portrait-gallery. He is a knife-grinder by profession, and an incarnation of every social virtue by creation of the Master; a richly humorous, keen, and genial old mannikin. His quaintly-decorated machine carries this emblem, painted by his own hand: "Iron sharpeneth iron; so a man shapeneth the countenance of his friend." Read the scenes between Chirky and the Squire in Chapter II. The grim old precisian succumbs to the knife-grinder's mellow friendliness, though at first hard and cold as his own razors, the grinding of which he watches from his study window. He confesses his horror of Christmas ever since his son and daughter left home five years ago. Chirky expounds to him the virtues of the "iv'le of kindness," the cure for all domestic and social ills. "Get 'em homes, and try 'em wiv iv'le, squire, try 'em wiv iv'le." Sukey Pattersnip, the old servant to whom the squire has given notice a hundred times—"and no notice took, nor yet will be," she boasts triumphantly—is also a true Dickens creation. You will enjoy the description of Chirky's leisurely tour through the wonderful country scenes in the crisp December weather. How excellently Dickens does that sort of thing. And the dashes of gloom here and there: the encounter with the poor old couple, both insane, huddling together in the hedge to escape the keepers on their track; or the story that Matilda tells Chirky in the ruined church, kneeling where she knelt with her husband thirty years before. These characteristic incidents almost draw tears, wrong-headed as the sentiment may be. Of course you guess that Chirky, in his wanderings, is the deus ex machina who turns the hearts of fathers to their children, and of children to their fathers, and sends everyone home in time for the Christmas dinner. How they do eat, shades of Cockle and Beecham! But why should he die in the hospital on Christmas Day of all days? By all means read The Wayside Friend.

Competition No. 12 (New Series).

IN another part of this number will be found an announcement referring to the manner in which the ACADEMY proposes this year to make its annual award of one hundred and fifty guineas. Instead of dividing it into two or three sums to be given to authors of notable books, it will be apportioned into smaller sums of twenty-five guineas, for the encouragement of young writers, the money to go to successful competitors in six literary exercises. The character of those six exercises is already practically settled, but we think it would be interesting to have the sense of our readers on the matter as well, and, therefore, we offer our guinea prize this week to the competitor who sends us the best list of six literary tasks to set before the young authors whom we wish to encourage. As much variety as possible should be striven for, but in selecting subjects it should be borne in mind that we are setting a top limit of 2,000 words to all competitors. The literary exercises, therefore, should be those which can be properly performed within that space.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, December 12. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the first column of p. 708 or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers.

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

SOLOMON AND SOLOMONIC LITERATURE.

BY MONCURE D. CONWAY.

A CLEVER and original study of Solomon and the "Solomonic legend." "There is a vast Solomon mythology in Palestine, Abyssinia, Arabia, Persia, India, and Europe; the myths and legends concerning the traditional Wisest Man are various, and merit a comparative study they have not yet received." This book is an essay in that study. (Kegan Paul. 6s.)

THE PASSING OF THE EMPIRES.

BY G. MASPERO.

WE have here the third volume of Prof. Maspero's work, The History of the Ancient Peoples of the Classic East. It brings down the history of Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Persia, Media, &c., to the conquests of Alexander the Great. Among other things of interest to Bible students, it deals with the circumstances attending the captivities of Israel and Judah, and throws much light on the historic references in the Prophets. (S.P.C.K. 25s.)

AMONG ENGLISH HEDGEROWS.

BY CLIFTON JOHNSON.

THESE sketches of rural life are allied in feeling to Washington Irving's Sketch Book, and the photographs which illustrate them are selected with the true American eye for English beauty. They are charming. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.)

LUCA SIGNORELLI.

BY MAUD CRUTTWELL.

THIS story is carried out on the literary lines, and with the usual equipments of the series of "Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture" to which it belongs. "Nothing trivial or insignificant enters into his perception of life," says the author, summing up Signorelli's qualities. (Bell.)

THE NEW EVANGELISM.

BY HENRY DRUMMOND.

THESE seven papers have been found among the late Prof. Henry Drummond's MSS. In a few cases portions of an MS. are missing, and such omissions are shown by asterisks. "What is the new Evangelism?" asks Prof. Drummond; and answers it characteristically: "I do not

THE SCIENTIFIC BASIS OF MORALITY.

By G. GORE.

MR. GORE attempts "to place the subject of human conduct upon a comprehensive scientific basis." It is a constructive denial of such an assumption as Mr. W. H. Mallock's in Is Life Worth Living?—"The world of morals is as distinct from the world of science as a wine from the cup which holds it." For his motto the author takes the couplet [his own?]:

When all is known, and all is understood,
Mankind will see, whatever is good.

(Sonnenschein. 10s. 6d. net.)

MODERN SPAIN, 1788-1898.

By MARTIN A. S. HUME.

THIS is the fifty-third volume in the "Story of the Nations" series. Mr. Hume, an admitted authority on Spain, reviews the history of the country from 1788-1898, thus including the loss of Cuba and the Philippines. "It may be that the loss of her vast possessions will prove a blessing in disguise to the Niobe of nations." (Unwin. 5s.)

THOUGHTS ON HUNTING.

By PETER BECKFORD.

THE first edition was published in 1781. "There had been no text-book on hunting previous to its appearance, and there has been nothing to rival it since," says Mr. J. Otho Paget, the editor of this handsome reprint. With modern type and excellent illustrations, the book is sure of renewed popularity. (Methuen. 10s. 6d.)

THE LIFE OF WELLINGTON.

By THE RIGHT HON. SIR HERBERT MAXWELL.

A COMPANION biography to Captain Mahan's Life of Nelson. It aims to be an impartial review of the whole of Wellington's career. Turning, out of curiosity, to Sir Herbert Maxwell's account of Waterloo, our eye is pleased by this: "Shortly after eleven o'clock, coils of white smoke surge out from the French left, and a mighty roar crashed along the dark hedge of war. The British batteries on the allied right made sonorous response; the ominous sound rolled as far as Walhain, sixteen miles to the east, where Grouchy, having finished a leisurely breakfast, was dallying with a dish of strawberries." The best of maps and illustrations are among the equipments of these two fine volumes. (Sampson Low.)

THE KINGS' LYRICS.

SELECTED BY FITZROY CARRINGTON.

A Dainty and delightfully produced sheaf of the lyrical poems of the reigns of James I. and Charles I. The poems are printed in type of contemporary pattern, and are embellished with reproductions of old portraits. (Duckworth. 2s. 6d. net.)

SIDE-LIGHTS ON SOUTH AFRICA.

By MRS. ROY DEVEREUX.

To have been to South Africa is the principal qualification for authorship just now; but Mrs. Roy Devereux has others. She went to South Africa to escape insomnia. "I wanted to touch the hands of strangers, and to feel the wind of the desert in my face." These impressions and observations are vivacious reading. (Sampson Low.)

BRITISH CONTEMPORARY ARTISTS. By COSMO MONKHOUSE.

SEVEN studies: Mr. Watts, Sir John Everett Millais, Lord Leighton, Sir Edward Burne-Jones, Mr. Orchardson, Sir L. Alma-Tadema, and Sir Edward J. Poynter. "Each study is a separate one, in which the artist is treated, as far as possible, in relation to his own aims and achievements, without comparison, odious or other, with his fellows." (Heinemann.)

HEALTH ABROAD. EDITED BY EDMUND HOBHOUSE, M.D.

"IT cannot be too strongly impressed on the reader that this work is not intended to obviate the necessity of seeking medical aid." Just so. The book is a handy guide for the invalid, in which he may learn when to go to Cairo, why not to go to Chili, and what is the mean maximum temperature of Wagenaar's Kraal. A useful book, written by experts. (Smith, Elder & Co. 6s.)

POEMS By Stephen Phillips. Containing "Christ in Hades" and "Marpessa."

Mr. WILLIAM WATSON, in the Fortnightly, says: "In 'Marpessa' he has demonstrated what I should hardly have thought demonstrable—that another poem can be finer than 'Christ in Hades.' I had long believed, and my belief was shared by not a few, that the poetic possibilities of classic myth were exhausted, yet the youngest of our poets takes this ancient story and makes it newly beautiful, kindles it into tremulous life, clothes it with the mystery of interwoven delight and pain, and in the best sense keeps it classic all the while."

 "Some of the papers are of uncommon interest."—Speaker.
 "Mr. Hazlitt's industry in throwing fresh light on the biography of his grandfather as well as on his literary and other friendships is sufficiently justified in this volume, which is full of treasure trove."—Daily Chronicle.

THE WIND AMONG THE REEDS. By W. B. YEATS. With Cover Design by Althea Giles. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net. (Second Edition.)
 "The dreams of a poet . . . of a poet who loves the twilight better than sunshine and dim cloud forms better than the loveliest ever chiselled out of marble, or moulded in flesh; what he sings of is the sense of mystery in things that haunt and overpower the mind to the exclusion of more human feelings. . . . It has the most beautiful cover that we have ever seen on any modern book."—Spectator.

THE ISLAND RACE. By HENRY NEWBOLT. Crown 8vo. 5s. net. (Third Thousand.)
 "Of the Forty Poems in this Volume, twelve appeared in 'Admirals All,' now in a Sixteenth Edition.
 "Not without a touch of legend did we open Mr. Newbolt's second book of poetry. Could he keep up to the high standard of inspiration and accomplishment set in his booklet 'Admirals All'? There had not been wanting critics to predict that Mr. Newbolt, like the Admirals of his song, had 'said his say,' and that nothing more could be expected of him. . . . The Island Race, let us say at once, puts the croakers to shame. It contains nothing better than the best things in 'Admirals All,' for the excellent reason that these things were perfect in their kind and could not be bettered. Scarcely a poem of the whole forty is without its note of metrical charm, its memorable line or stanza."—Daily Chronicle.

AN ALPHABET. With Rhymes and Pictures. By ALICE M. HORTON. Imperial 18mo. 1s. 6d. net. (Second Thousand.)
 "Few children's books are in such absolute sympathy with the simple needs of a child. The pictures are cleverly drawn without affecting decorative mannerisms, and they display not only a happy facility for catching the unconscious grace and charm of children's attitudes but also great promise of the development of an individual black and white style."—Liverpool Mercury.
 "Miss Horton has an unerring instinct for the beautiful in drawing line, and her child faces are very sweet and winning. As for her charming rhymes they are eminently suitable for the little ones, that may be permitted the indulgence of saying that Mr. Wilson Hallett, the wonderful child mimic, has secured a copy for use in his entertainment and among the children whom he understands so well."—M.A.P.

EXTRACTS from the PROPHETICAL BOOKS, arranged with
 A HARMONY of the PARALLEL NARRATIVES and a COMMENTARY.

By ANDREW WOOD, M.A.,

Trinity College, Cambridge, Rector of Great Ponton, Lincs., Diocesan Inspector of Schools.

EXTRACTS from Dr. PAYNE SMITH'S INTRODUCTION:

"The object of this important Commentary is unique. It is to exhibit the History of the Hebrew Monarchy in a connected narrative, with everything necessary for its elucidation. Thus it . . . ends with those portions of the prophetic books which throw light upon the purpose of the Hebrew Monarchy, the reasons of its fall, and its survival in that which was ever the true reason of its existence—the spiritual reign of David's Son . . . and under the veil of an earthly kingdom they reveal to us the nature of the true Kingdom of God. . . ."

The Bishop of Durham (Dr. Westcott): "A very solid and valuable help to the study of the history of Israel, admirable in plan and execution."
 The late Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone: "I am delighted with it."

Startling Innovation in Religious Magazines

THE Sunday Strand.

120 Pages. 200 Illustrations.

SIXPENCE MONTHLY.

First Number ready about 15th Dec.

Messrs. GEORGE NEWNES, Limited, have decided to produce a religious monthly that shall be, at any rate, equal to any other sixpenny magazine ever published.

Arrangements have already been made of an extended and well-matured character, reaching far into every quarter of the religious world. They cannot undertake to make at this time anything like a complete or specific announcement. The following, however, will suffice to indicate the high quality and wide range which the magazine will contain.

'THE LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST.'

By IAN MACLAREN,

Author of "The Mind of the Master," "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush," &c.

"The Life of Jesus Christ," by the Rev. Dr. Watson (better known as Ian MacLaren) is a work that will in itself command immense attention. For several years Dr. Watson has been meditating and forming this the greatest work of his life, and at last presents it through the medium of "THE SUNDAY STRAND" to the religious public of Great Britain. Dr. Watson has not followed the method of any other writer upon this subject, but has with reverent tones treated it with all the freshness of his vivid insight into the tenderest and more pathetic sides of the character of the Master, rather than with dry, scholarly exposition of the text. The illustrations are by Mr. Corwin Linson, one of the greatest religious artists. This artist has been compared favourably with even Tissot, and spent two years in Palestine preparing the illustrations. After the fullest and most patient study, he has produced 200 paintings and drawings representing the chief scenes and episodes in the Life of Christ. In the value and interest of the text and the variety and fitness of the illustrations, this will be an extraordinary serial.

SIR WALTER BESANT

has written specially for this Magazine a Serial Story depicting the extraordinary hold which the spirit of gambling can obtain over the heart and mind of an otherwise good man. This story will be of exceeding interest, and for pathos and dramatic episode is perhaps one of the best serials this well-known author has ever written.

DORE'S PICTURES.

An Illustrated Article, reproducing all the famous Pictures of Gustave Doré.

A SACRED SONG,

By A. H. BERNARD, entitled "An Angel's Pinions" almost if not quite equal to his famous song "Daddie."

An Illustrated Interview with
Ian MacLaren.

By Mr. HARRY HOW.

With Pictures specially taken for The Sunday Strand.Has Dr. Parker become a Spiritualist?

The Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain as a Sunday-School Teacher.

What has come out of the "Darkest England Scheme"?

How Dr. Barnardo Finds his Babies.
Full of pathos and touching pictures.

Six or Seven Stories by the great Story-writer of the day—Headon Hill, Robert Halifax, Pett Ridge, E. M. Jameson, A. E. Cooper, and others.

A Christmas Story:

A TRIP to SANTA KLAUS-LAND.

Illustrated by GORDON BROWNE.

No money will be spared to make "The Sunday Strand" the finest and brightest Religious Magazine possible to be produced for Sixpence.

7 to 12, Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

TWO YEARS in PALESTINE and SYRIA.

By MARGARET THOMAS, author of "A Scamper through Spain and Tangier."

Daily Chronicle: "This is an admirable book, throughout fresh, readable, and picturesque, and giving information in a pleasant, easy way, neither lacking in humour nor in reverence. The illustrations are excellent, both in colour and in choice of subjects. Altogether the book is one that deserves a wide circulation. The author is to be congratulated on a piece of work which is as sound as it is unpretentious."

Catholic Times: "A work which may be described as a necessary companion to 'Henry VIII. and the English Monasteries.' The 'Eve of the Reformation' is, in its way, as important as his epoch-making book on monastic life in Reformation days, and it will, we feel sure, be read eagerly by the people as well as by students of history."

JOSEF ISRAËLS. With a Portrait in Photogravure, and 30 Reproductions of drawings by the author. Translated from the Dutch by ALEXANDER TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS.

Notes—The author and illustrator of this book has long been acknowledged the most popular painter of the day, in this, the best sense, that his work claims the admiration not only of the artist, the collector, and the dilettante, but also of those uncultured people who understanding nothing of painting, having no care for artisticity or virtuosity, cannot fail to be penetrated by the poetry that fills each of the veteran's canvases.

Mr. Nimmo has supplied the want in this handsomely-printed volume, which is enriched by photogravure portraits and numerous other illustrations, derived from Mr. Joseph Grego's ample store of old prints."

The Literary Week.

ON page 723 will be found the particulars of the system of Awards to Authors which we have this year decided to make. On page 729 will be found particulars of a special Prize Competition.

THE fire which devastated the premises of Messrs. Ballantyne & Hanson in Tavistock-street, last week, destroyed and imperilled a good many literary MSS. One important firm of publishers is still anxiously endeavouring to discover what is the extent of its losses, but up to the time of writing it has not been possible to complete the necessary search.

ON and after January 1, all books published by Messrs. Lawrence & Bullen, Ltd., will be supplied through Mr. William Heinemann, 21, Bedford-street, Covent Garden. Messrs. Lawrence & Bullen, Ltd., will continue to carry on their print-selling business at 16, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden. They will also publish from those offices the old-established weekly paper Land and Water under entirely new editorship and new management.

AN authoritative statement concerning the dissolution of the Harper-McClure alliance, which has been printed in the Commercial Advertiser of New York, says that it was agreed from the first that the alliance would not become a fact until after a certain time. During the interval left for the purpose Mr. McClure and his associates found it impossible to adjust some of the questions which had to be answered to the satisfaction of both parties, and therefore withdrew. That action is the result of mutual and friendly conclusions on both sides. "Mr. McClure and his associates will carry out the plans for an encyclopædia and other enterprises which Mr. McClure had hoped to undertake in connexion with Harper & Brothers. The plan for the encyclopædia was entered upon by Mr. McClure some months before the Harper negotiations arose, and when Mr. McClure withdrew from Harper & Brothers, Mr. Page, who had been secured by Mr. McClure to edit the encyclopædia, joined the S. S. McClure Company, and will carry on the development of the encyclopædia."

A CORRESPONDENT indignantly protests against the omission from our review of the year of any mention of The Autobiography of a Child. In so brief a summary certain books are almost bound to escape notice; but in the present instance the cause is somewhat amusing. General literature and fiction were entrusted to different critics, one of whom omitted The Autobiography of a Child because he thought it was fiction, and the other because he thought it was not.

THE Daily News seems to be somewhat embarrassed by the replies to its "Children's Books Competition," for it is unable to state a day on which the result can be announced. We can sympathise with our contemporary; we know what such competitions mean. We thought at the time that in asking for lists of a hundred children's books the Daily News was on the way to trouble. Lists of ten are difficult enough to negotiate in large numbers.

SEVERAL correspondents ask for the author of the poem—"England, my England"—quoted in a recent "Thing Seen." It is by Mr. W. E. Henley, and may be found in his collected Poems, published by Mr. Nutt. In response to more than one request we take the liberty of quoting the poem entire. Surely it was never more timely than now.

What have I done for you,
England, my England?
What is there I would not do,
England, my own?
With your glorious eyes austere,
As the Lord were walking near,
Whispering terrible things and dear
As the Song on your bugles blown,
England—
Round the world on your bugles blown!

Where shall the watchful Sun,
England, my England,
Match the master-work you've done,
England, my own?
When shall he rejoice agen
Such a breed of mighty men
As come forward, one to ten,
To the Song on your bugles blown,
England—
Down the years on your bugles blown?

Ever the faith endures,
England, my England:—
"Take and break us: we are yours,
England, my own!
Life is good, and joy runs high
Between English earth and sky:
Death is death; but we shall die
To the Song on your bugles blown,
England—
To the stars on your bugles blown!"

They call you proud and hard,
England, my England:
You with worlds to watch and ward,
England, my own!
You whose mailed hand keeps the keys
Of such teeming destinies
You could know nor dread nor ease
Were the Song on your bugles blown,
England,
Round the Pit on your bugles blown!

Mother of Ships whose might,
England, my England,
Is the fierce old Sea's delight,
England, my own,
Chosen daughter of the Lord,
Spouse-in-Chief of the ancient sword,
There's the menace of the Word
In the Song on your bugles blown,
England—
Out of heaven on your bugles blown!

THE best poem which the war has yet produced was printed in last week's Spectator. It has, indeed, a simplicity and sincerity which lift it above occasional poetry to a plane of permanence. The author is Mr. Henry Newbolt, and this is the poem :

THE VOLUNTEER.

He leapt to arms unbidden,
Unneeded, over-bold :
His face by earth is hidden,
His heart in earth is cold.
"Curse on the reckless daring
That could not wait the call,
The proud fantastic bearing
That would be first to fall!"
*O tears of human passion,
Blur not the image true ;
This was not folly's fashion,
This was the man we knew.*

ONE of the audience at the Navy League meeting at Rottingdean, at which Mr. Kipling made a speech, sends us the following interesting description of the novelist as orator: "When he showed face in the schoolroom—it was crowded—his Rottingdean neighbours cheered him mightily, and he blushed like a great kid. When he got up on the platform to speak he was as white as a ghost. His voice rather reminded me of Charles Hawtrey's, but it's not so strong and rather more refined. He had evidently learnt his little speech off by heart, and spun it out at a terrific rate. Of course, that was nervousness. It struck me that he felt if he were to hesitate he would be lost. The Big Englanders will never get Kipling as a platform spouter. He'd collapse at the end of his third meeting. After he had done speaking he jumped off the platform, and for five minutes or so sat fidgeting in a chair; then suddenly he picked up his overcoat, slung it on his arm, and bolted from the schoolroom as if somebody had yelled: 'The roof's giving way!' So he never heard the professional Navy League lecturer—and he didn't miss much. I should mention that, while making his speech, Kipling gazed fixedly over the heads of the audience at a lantern stuck on the wall, and never moved either his head or hands. He spent the afternoon decorating the schoolroom with flags, bunting, &c., but I can't say much for his decorative taste; the stuff was strung across and across in the crudest way. The Rottingdean folk seem to be very fond of him."

MR. DOOLEY does not view the Maine hospital-ship with favour. He seems to think there are too many American soldiers in the Philippines needing succour too, and the thought has impelled him to some caustic remarks, in Harper's Weekly, on public fickleness. Thus :

"No. Hinnissy, people wants novelties in war. Th' war fashions iv 1898 is out iv style. They ar-re too full in the waist an' too long in th' skirt. Th' style has changed. There ar-re fifty thousand backward men in th' fair isles iv th' Passyfic, fightin' to free th' Philippeen fr'm himsilf, an' becomin' a casualty in th' operation, but no wan is charterin' ar-rmy hospital-ships f'r thim. No wan is convertin' anny steam-yachts f'r thim. No wan is sindin' eighty tons iv plum-puddin' to complete th' wurruk iv destruction. They ar-re in a war that 'd make th' British throops in Africa think they were drillin' f'r a prize banner. But 'tis an oufashionable war. 'Tis an ol' war made over fr'm garments formerly worn by heroes. . . . Th' new style iv war is made in London, an' all our set is simply stuck on it. Th' casualties in th' Philippeens can walk home, but is it possible that anny throe an' well-dhressed American can stand to see th' signs [scions] iv th' ancient British aristocracy taken care iv be their own gover'mint? 'What!' says Lady John Jennings (her that was th' daughter iv wan iv our bravest an' best racon-toore)—'what!' she says, 'will anny American woman residin' in London see men shot down,' she says, 'that has but recently played polo in our very sight,' she says, 'an' be brought home in mere thransports?' she says. 'Ladies,' she says, 'lave us equip a hospital-ship,' she says. 'I thrust,' she says, 'that all iv us has been long enough fr'm home to fr'get our despicable domestic struggles,' she says, 'an' think on'y iv humanity,' she says. An' when she opens up th' shop f'r subscriptions ye'd think fr'm th' crowd that 'twas th' first night iv th' horse show. I don't know what Lem Stiggins, iv Kansas—marked down in th' roll, private in th' Twintieth Kansas, Severely—I don't know what Private Severely thinks iv it. An' I wuddent like to know till aft'her Thankgivin'."

WE give below facsimile pages from the minute edition of the Compleat Angler which the Clarendon Press has issued as a proof of what its Oxford India paper can do.

THE COMPLEAT ANGLER. [Ch.

Pet. I marry Sir, this is Musick indeed, this has cheer'd my heart, and made me remember six Verses in praise of Musick, which I will speak to you instantly.
*Musick, miraculous Rhetorick, that speak't it Without a tongue, exceeding eloquence;
With what ease might thy errors be excus'd
Wert thou as truly lov'd as th' art abus'd!
But though dull souls neglect, & some reprove thee,
I cannot hate thee, 'cause the Angels love thee.*

Pen. And the repetition of these last Verses of musick have call'd to my memory what Mr. Ed. Walter (a Lover of the Angler) says of Love and Musick.

XVI.] THE COMPLEAT ANGLER.

*Whilst I listen to thy voice
(Chloris) I feel my heart decay:
That powerful voice,
Calls my fleeting Soul away:
Oh! suppose that magic sound
Which destroys without a wound.
Peace Chloris, peace, or singing die,
That together you and I
To Heaven may go:
For all we know
Of what the blessed do above
Is, that they sing, and that they love.*

Pisc. Well remembered brother Peter, these Verses came seasonably, and we thank you heartily. Come, we will all joyn together, my Host, and all, and sing my Scholars Catch over again, and then each man drink the tother cup and to bed,

TWO FACSIMILE PAGES FROM THE INDIAN PAPER "COMPLEAT ANGLER."

This little book might be described as a homœopathic dose of literature. It is complete, and yet it weighs no more than a pencil and in the waistcoat pocket would almost have to be probed for.

OTHER little books, two or three inches square, come from Messrs. Wells Gardner. These, however, are for children rather than their elders, and, as children like little books, they may be popular. The books are Blake's Songs of Innocence, The Story without an End, translated from Carove, Mark Lemon's Enchanted Doll, Favourite Fables, and The Seven Champions of Christendom.

A CORRESPONDENT, M. L. M., sends us the following "Thing Heard":

HOSTESS (talking to two new callers, mother and daughter): "When you were in Samoa did you see anything of the Stevensons?"

DAUGHTER: "It was last year that we were there, but I went over the house at Vailama."

MOTHER: "The Stevensons, my dear? I don't seem to remember about them."

HOSTESS: "Robert Louis —"

MOTHER (still wondering): "Oh, Robert Lewis. I don't seem —"

DAUGHTER (rather impatiently): "Oh, he wrote things. Treasure Island, Kidnapped —"

MOTHER: "Oh, did he?" (Then, evidently not wishing to appear ignorant) "I really think I must have heard the name, but I can't remember."

It is, of course, odd that people visiting Samoa as tourists should not at least have heard Stevenson's name; but the idea that Stevenson has ever been a popular author, or will ever be one, is, of course, wrong. He belongs only to schoolboys and to a clique—an extensive clique, it is true, when compared with some cliques, but a clique none the less.

MR. E. F. BENSON, the author of Dodo, contributes to the Nineteenth Century an ingenious article on Plagiarism. His argument, put briefly, is that theft is unavoidable, but that only unintelligent theft is plagiarism; critical theft is compatible with the truest originality of which, at this late stage in the world's progress, we are capable. Mr. Benson illustrates his theory by an analogy drawn from physiology. Thus: "There exist in this world great masses of admirable literary food, the inherited treasury of the race. On these we feed, and without them we starve. But as it is necessary that we should assimilate what we take, the food must be digested. That done, it becomes a part of us, it enters into our muscles, our bones, our brains; it has caused, and is causing, to make us grow in our own small manner; and the words we use, and the things we write, and the songs we sing, are the inevitable outcome of the nourishment we have received. But if all this has not been assimilated, there ensues the sense of sin, and other disorders, and we know that we have used somehow wrongly what was meant to feed us. And thus the warrant of arrest for plagiarism is served."

MR. WILLIAM PLATT's forthcoming book, which he will publish himself, A Threefold Utterance, is heralded by a circular, addressed to Art Lovers, so resolutely and confidently worded as to be a departure amounting almost to a revolution in such forms of literature. It runs thus:

Maeterlinck said of my books: "I know few which are more absolutely by a man"; the Daily Chronicle critic said: "Seldom have we read anything which gave us so profound an impression of its author's unfitness for authorship."

To be called "A Man" by a great Poet; to be called "not a literary man" by a conventional critic; these verdicts together represent almost the highest conceivable praise.

But beyond my writings which have been thus criticised, and my music which has been similarly criticised, I have also worked at drawing; and my drawings have not yet been seen.

I now propose to offer for subscription a book of Music, Poems, and Drawings, all of my own creation; a threefold utterance, yet a single outcry of a man's fiery outlook upon life. Such a book is undoubtedly unique.

This edition, of which each copy will be signed and numbered, will not exceed 200 copies—possibly it will not reach that number.

I, the artist, have done my share; it remains for you, as Art-lover, to help this book to see the light.

This is straightforward, and we hope that Mr. Platt will have no difficulty in disposing of his full two hundred.

THE Council of the Hull Literary Society seem to have humorists among them. Their invitation to a convivial annual meeting takes the form of a Declaration of War. Here is an extract from this document:

The enemy is believed to be under the command of General Dull Care, and has taken up a strongly entrenched position on the heights known as the Bilious Range, which dominates a large tract of Smiling Country.

The immediate point of attack will be the onslaught upon which will be led by the Commandant in person, President Lummis, the charge being sounded at 7.30 prompt by the distinguished Rattle-Wielder to the Club, Secretary Andrews.

THE BOAR'S HEAD,

Members responding to this call will form a Special Service Corps, to be known as the YULETIDE REVELLERS.

They are expected to wear their own proper uniform of Morning Dress, as well as the Regulation No. 9 Smile, without which none will be permitted to fall in (and with which it will be impossible to fall out). They will also furnish their own equipment in the shape of Pipe and Pouch, Ammunition (not smokeless), Latch-key, and such other implements as may be necessary to ensure their repose (of mind only) during the engagement.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & Co. write: "We find that a map, showing in colours the positions of the contending forces at the crisis of the Battle of Waterloo, has been omitted from Sir Herbert Maxwell's Life of Wellington, published by us. As Sir Herbert would like this map inserted in the second edition, which is now at press, we think it only fair to purchasers of copies of the first edition to say that we are printing an extra supply of this particular map, and will send a copy post free to anyone who has purchased a copy of the first edition, if they will apply to us for it."

THE second volume of the "Publications of the Irish Texts Society" will be issued to subscribers in a few days. It will contain Fled Bricrenn, or "The Feast of Bricrin," edited from the version to be found in Leabhar na h-Uidhre, Royal Irish Academy, the most ancient existing of the great Irish collections of MSS., compiled and collated with the Gaelic MS. in the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh, and other versions. The tale is one of the most spirited of the ancient Irish romances, and contains the famous verbal dispute among the wives of the three chief heroes of Ireland, known in old times as the "Women's War of Words," in which each lady contends for the pre-eminence in valour and beauty of her own lord. It is full of descriptions which throw light upon the manners of pagan Ireland. The text is being edited, with translation, glossaries, and full linguistic and historical notes, by George Henderson, M.A., Ph.D.

THE American Bookman has been getting into a little difficulty with a correspondent about two diametrically opposite opinions of Miss Harraden's novel, The Fowler, which it expressed in June and July last. Their correspondent, "G. H. B.," quotes both passages, and asks the Editor to reconcile them or explain them. We like the Bookman's reply:

Now we fancy that most editors would suppress this little communication altogether. It is a facer. We cannot get around it, or crawl under it, or lightly float away from it in a verbal mist. But if we have any virtue at all, we think that we may truthfully lay claim to the virtue of perfect frankness; and so we are just going to tell "G. H. B." the whole inside history of this painful affair. When the June and July numbers of the Bookman were being made up for the press, and, for that matter, after they had appeared, the Senior Editor was in the country leading a harmless, but idle and irresponsible life. For the moment his philosophy was the philosophy of Harold Skimpole; and the shadows on the grass and the sussurus of the bees temporarily obscured his immediate interest in his editorial functions. Consequently, when he wrote his review of The Fowler he was oblivious of the fact that other editorial writers in the Bookman had expressed an opinion different from his own; and the result was a certain lack of conductivity between the different departments of the magazine, a slight critical assymetry, or, to put it more lucidly, an absence of the true Anaxagorean homoeomeria. This, of course, was very very wrong; but if "G. H. B." has meditated earnestly upon the profounder problems of human life, he must be aware that almost anything can happen in the summer.

WE were in error last week in stating that Mr. N. H. Dole's multivariorum edition of Omar Khayyam was not on sale in this country. As a matter of fact, Messrs. Macmillan publish it here. The same firm has just brought out an edition of FitzGerald's four versions, together with the original prefaces and notes. The price of this work, bound in vellum, is eight-and-sixpence net, which leads to the reflection that the half-guinea asked by Messrs. Macmillan for their ordinary edition of the poem was rather severe.

MR. CLEMENT SHORTER writes: "By a slip, due to my infamous handwriting, you have referred to Dr. Edward Moore's two handsome and scholarly volumes on Dante issued by the Clarendon Press as by 'Dr. Edward Morris.'"

MR. SALOMON REINACH, writing from Paris, but giving no address, sends us the following: "In reference to your article about terra-cotta statuettes (December 9, p. 668), please allow me to state that 'The Three Graces' and 'The Conversation at the Tomb,' in the South Kensington Museum, are forgeries of the worst sort. Most of the groups of figures displayed at South Kensington are no better, and ought not to be exhibited as antiques."

MR. HILAIRE BELLOC, author of The Bad Child's Book of Beasts and The Life of Danton, has written a skit on Oxford University dons, to be called Lambkin's Remains. There is an introductory ode to the Republican Club. The book is one that will appeal particularly to University men, but also to certain of the public. It should peculiarly delight Ruskin Hall, which has a crusade of its own against donnishness.

MESSRS. MANSELL send us a photograph of the new Botticelli, or alleged Botticelli. It is hard to come to any conclusion from a photograph, but the picture certainly bears more traces than not of the master.

THE following definition of a "problem novel" by the World is a good specimen of the crusted, intolerant manner: "A 'problem novel,' in the accepted sense of the phrase, is the outcome of the attempt of some literary doctrinaire to use the form of fiction as a vehicle for the advancement of some eccentric and commonly obnoxious social or other propaganda. It is one of the favourite nostrums of the crank, the faddist, the Ishmaelite, and the posing reformer, and its failure to gain tolerance surely needs no further explanation."

Bibliographical.

WE have become familiar of late years with "Short Histories" of this and that country or nation. It may be that "Short Lives" of this and that person will, before very long, become equally numerous. There are thousands of people who literally have not the leisure in which to master our bigger biographies. Take, as an outstanding example, the Life of Archbishop Benson, issued to-day (Friday). In one volume there are 646 pages, in the other 850—in all, 1,496, practically 1,500. Now, I can well believe that there are many ecclesiastics, as well as many laymen ecclesiastically disposed, by whom these 1,500 pages will be, in every sense, religiously perused. But the general public—the average subscriber to Smith's and Mudie's—what can they do with such a solid production? They can but regard it with amazement and regret. Such a work cannot be condensed by the mere process of "cutting." For the benefit of the ordinary reader the tale has to be told afresh, and hence the announcement of a "Short Life" of Dr. Pusey, for the use of the very large number who cannot possibly tackle the "standard" biography in four volumes. Some day, perhaps, we shall have a "Short Life" of Dr. Benson.

"Can you, or any of your readers," writes the Rev. H. J. Wilmot Buxton, "tell me the name of the author of Whitefriars; or, the Days of Charles II.? I read it first, with great interest, more than forty years ago. It was, I think, followed by Whitehall, which I could not read." Are we, then, so soon forgot? Can it be that the name of Emma Robinson, author of Whitefriars and Whitehall, has already faded out of memory? The first of these two books came out in 1844, the second in the year following. The former was reprinted in 1884. Both have had the distinction of being translated into French. Whitefriars had the further distinction, if distinction it be, of forming the basis of a play by W. T. Townsend. Many are the stories, besides these two, which go to the credit of their author. For example—Richelieu in Love, The Maid of Orleans, Queen Tudor, Cæsar Borgia, Westminster Abbey, The City Banker, The Matrimonial Vanity Fair, Which Wins—Love or Money? and The Armourer's Daughter (1877), which seems to have been the last of the long series.

Among forthcoming new editions I note the promise of a reprint of The New Republic, which has had a very good sale, I believe, in its cheap and handy form in the Mayfair Library. When it came out originally, in 1877, it was in all the glory of two-volume form. It was followed, you remember, in 1878, by The New Paul and Virginia, which many people think even wittier and more amusing than its predecessor from the same hand. Why should that not be reprinted, too? Another new edition, announced by the same firm, is one of "Theodore Taylor's" Golden Treasury of Thought, which first saw the light in 1874. This was one of the compilations of John Camden Hotten, whose little book on Thackeray was such a triumph of scissors and paste. Will the Treasury be brought down to date, I wonder?

The author of the anonymous éloge on Richard Holt Hutton, which appeared not so very long ago, stands revealed now as Mr. John Hogben. And this is by no means Mr. Hogben's first incursion into letters. One remembers him as having published, some fifteen years ago, editions of the poetical works of Campbell and of Keats, to which he prefixed introductions. A little later he brought out a selection from the verse of Pope, also with an introduction, I think. Still more recently he edited, with a preface, a selection from the verse written by his father, Mr. W. S. Hogben.

The latest edition of Earle's Microcosmography has appended to it a reprint of J. Healy's translations into English of the Characters of Theophrastus, which dates, apparently, from 1616. It is claimed that this is the first reprint of Healy's version, which seems to have been the first. About a century later came Eustace Budgett's; then came one by H. Gally (1725), another by W. Rayner (1797), and yet another, by Isaac Taylor (1836). Did not Henry Morley include one or other of these in his Carisbrooke Library?

"Always verify your quotations." In the Epilogue to his "Charge of the Heavy Brigade" Tennyson, as most of us remember, wrote:

And here the Singer for his Art
Not all in vain may plead
"The song that nerves a nation's heart
Is in itself a deed."

The two last lines have just appeared in a London Sunday paper in this form:

"The song that nerves a nation's arm
May well be called a deed."

Delightfully prosaic, is it not?

Of Mr. Robert Buchanan's work in verse a well-known "Literary Lounger" says that: "To young readers it is entirely unknown, and I am not aware that the best parts of it are even accessible in print." I fear the first half of this sentence is true, but I fancy (and hope) the other half is not. The Poetical Works of Robert Buchanan were published by Chatto & Windus in 1884, and unless that volume (there was only one) is out of print the "best part" of the author's verse—which I take to be his output in that kind between 1866 and 1883—is happily accessible in very handy form.

I notice that Sir Herbert Maxwell concludes his biography of Wellington with a sonnet on the Great Duke, attributed to Benjamin Disraeli. Has that sonnet ever been reprinted before? I do not remember it. I may have read Sir Herbert's work a little hurriedly, but my impression is that he makes no allusion to Tennyson's Ode, which Stevenson was so humorously anxious that Mr. Gosse should not omit from his anthology.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

The "Chroniqueur."

Study and Stage. By William Archer. (Grant Richards. 5s.)

Frames of Mind. By A. B. Walkley. (Grant Richards. 5s.)

On Books and Arts. By Frederick Wedmore. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

PARIS which produces obscene caricatures of august and venerable women is also the home of the most refined journalism that the world has seen. In Paris the chronique, literary or dramatic or political, has been raised to the level of an artistic "form," and the chroniqueurs are often the great writers of the country. From Théophile Gautier to Paul Bourget there were and are journalists all bent on giving to their two-thousand-words about some affair of the week the final elegance of perfect craftsmanship. Even Rochefort, of the unspeakable Intransigeant, will flout a whole nation in sentences of which the chief characteristic is style. "It is brains, not cities, that need illuminating," he wrote on the morning of the fêtes for the Franco-Russian alliance, and the phrase was consummate. In Paris, where a five-centimes sheet will employ three stylists to report a play—soiriste, courrieriste, and critic proper; in Paris, where (so to speak) Mr. George Meredith will do his column upon Thomas Hardy's new book for the front page of the Times; in Paris the chronique has a literary importance undreamed of here. Nevertheless we learn—we learn rapidly. We possess men now of whom we have the right to be proud. Some of them have studied their craft in the French newspapers to excellent advantage. Mr. A. B. Walkley, for instance, would be the first to admit how much he owes of finesse and delicacy to the inspiration of MM. Jules Lemaitre and Anatole France: say that his articles are lemaitrises and he will feel flattered.

At the same time there are others who have contrived to formulate themselves with immense success under no influence but their own. Mr. William Archer, for example, is no more French than Chinese; the "W. A." stuff, unsurpassed, perhaps, for solid influence, is typically and utterly British. Mr. Archer's gradual rise during the last sixteen years, though thoroughly deserved, is, at the first examination, a little curious. Most good literary critics, if they have not style, have "literariness." Mr. Archer has never had that ease and grace of manner which would seem to be necessary to one whose trade it is to appeal to a literary public. We fancy that he has always written with difficulty, and his articles demonstrate absolutely that his appreciation of verbal niceties is imperfect—in fact, he is capable of clumsinesses and solecisms which would ruin him with the lettered if he did not happen to be William Archer. Glance through Study and Stage and you will find "journalese" on every page—clichés like "set the Thames on fire," "thick as leaves in Vallombrosa," "the effect does not come off," "to all intents and purposes," "why drag in Homer?" He has wonderful pet locutions of which he never tires, such as "to body forth" and "soul-states." He is not ashamed of that marvellous verb "envisage," or of this phrase: "The as yet but semi-vocal Scottish peasant." He frequently uses words to which no exact meaning can be attached: "the admirably-ordered process [? progress or procession] of the scenes"; "vivid and compulsive impression of vivacity" (note the awkward collocation of the first and last words); "tersely-touched episodes."

Further, Mr. Archer is apt to lose his sense of proposition, his perspective. In one article we find the following: "The third act is a gem from first to last"; "a brilliant . . . piece of work"; "perhaps the best light comedy produced within the present decade"; "its literary workmanship is excellent, its scenic skill consummate." The title of the article is "Lord and Lady Algy." Mr. Archer's attitude is seldom, as it should be, literary. He prints a criticism of Sudermann's tremendous novel, Der Katzensteg, under the heading "Prussian 'Patriotism.'" The criticism is unfavourable. "What makes Herr Sudermann's story inartistic and intolerable," he says, "is the fact that not a single soul (except Regina, who does not count) stands by Boleslav, and protests against the atrocious and savage injustice with which he is treated." As if the sheep-like unanimity of the ignorant villagers was not the very cornerstone of the book, and as if their behaviour, even if it were improbable, could make the novel inartistic! Mr. Archer is so annoyed by Sudermann's villagers, and so preoccupied by political considerations arising out of their conduct, that he ignores the fundamental power of imagination which gives the book importance, and which alone can make a work artistic. The same trait is to be observed in his depreciations of Evelyn Innes and The Triumph of Death. We can understand an instinctive antipathy to these novels of Mr. George Moore and d'Annunzio; but we can scarcely excuse a literary critic who devotes himself to the derision of characters while passing over the questions of imagination and technique, which are his proper province. Any competent diner-out could discuss the "soul-states" of Giorgio Aurispa, but it needs a critic to savour and appraise the strange sinister poetry which envelops all d'Annunzio's work, and to expound the triumphs of mere form which he accomplishes. Lastly, Mr. Archer's banter, when he happens to be hostile, is not always happy. Assuming that Evelyn Innes was from end to end a complete error of art, one would still think that for the ridicule of a work so dignified and sincere terms might have been found less crudely pert than the following: "From this abrupt conclusion . . . one gathers that Evelyn's wobblings are to be continued in our next. I trust she will get her spiritual struggles over with reasonable promptitude."

Yet these things are as nothing in the sum of Mr. Archer's achievement. The fact stands that his critical influence is a real influence finely exercised. His prestige is authentic, and there are several reasons why it should be so. He has certainly three of the essentials of a critic: honesty, intrepidity, and interest. The first, fortunately, is not rare; but Mr. Archer has it in a remarkable degree. His desire to render justice, to rid himself of all bias, amounts to a passion—a passion written large in every article. His traditions, in a word, are those of the English judicial bench. Intrepidity is less common, and a virtue less easy to practise. All critics know how difficult it is, in approaching a work of art, to forget the status of the artist and the general corpus of opinion which has already gathered round it. Many men habitually yield to this intimidation of names and public opinion; others go out to challenge it with a defiance which is worse than surrender. Few can calmly ignore it. Mr. Archer is of the few. You know that his eye, at once stern and kindly, will see nothing but the work itself. As for the quality of being interested, we believe that Mr. Archer's reputation is due largely to his endowment in this respect. He is never aloof, like some, but always down in the midst, patiently and laboriously probing and analysing. He cannot be tepid, perfunctory. It may be said, however, that his interest, as indeed we have shown, often inclines rather to subject than to treatment. Here, possibly, is the explanation of his traffic with the modern stage: all stories are very real to him; if the people in them are not alive, his idiosyncrasy vitalises them, and he discusses them as alive. Hence the allurements and value of his animadversions upon even the feeblest farce. In addition to these qualities, he has the crowning one of a catholic taste which knows no fads. His palate is just. He may at times go wrong; he may always be more or less at loggerheads with his medium of expression; but in the end he will prove that he has that mysterious, incommunicable, unmistakable thing (the possessors of which constitute a clan who recognise one another by infallible signs)—true critical perception. It is seldom that a writer can immediately say what he means. He inscribes a sentence, and lo! the trend of it is slightly out of the true direction. He may alter and he may alter, but he does not arrive at exactitude. Ultimately he leaves it, and tries in the next sentence to allow for the error of the last. And the march continues ever towards the goal, each step correcting the previous one. So with Mr. Archer. Sincere, strenuous, honest and unafraid, he moves doggedly forward, now blundering, now "wobbling" (to use his own term), but never deviating far from a course which twenty years or so of steady marching have made perfectly plain.

If there is one dominant quality in the criticisms of the year's literature and drama which Mr. Archer has collected under the title Study and Stage, that quality is seriousness, Scottish seriousness. And if there is one dominant quality in Mr. Walkley's very varied Frames of Mind, that quality is—a dreadful fear of being thought serious. He will be urbane, judicial, serene, but you must not expect him to be serious; he is far too much a man of the world for that. If The Mighty Atom sells a hundred thousand copies—what then? It will be all the same a century hence—so he would have us believe. Mr. Walkley is your true polite "spectator" of literature and life. He will sit in the club window, and discourse to you by the hour of what he sees therefrom. How light, airy, and mildly gay is his discreetly modulated gossip! He learnt, as we have said, the trick of it in Paris, for which place he has a strong predilection. He is grace itself and rapidity itself and omniscience itself. In his casual, careless way he has read everything. He never parades his learning; he only alludes to it. He knows you adore allusion, particularly allusion which you cannot follow, and so he has mastered the whole art of allusion. There is a very brief essay on the ideals of Jane Austen, in which is employed the very virtuosity of allusion; in seven tiny pages Mr. Walkley contrives to refer to Mr. Stephen Gwynn, Aucassin et Nicolette, Mr. Augustine Birrell, M. Georges Ohnet, Shakespeare, Ibsen, Wagner, Miss Marie Corelli, M. Desmoulins, Anne Radcliffe, Mr. George Meredith, Mr. J. M. Barrie, the Women Writers' Dinner, Carlyle, M. Bourget, the Tongue of the United States, Lewis Carroll, Peacock, Maria Edgeworth, Scott, Johnson, most of Jane Austen's characters, and sundry other persons whom we are unable at the moment to identify. It is marvellous and it is delightful. As for the mere matter of the essay, you must look for it with a microscope. You have read it, and you turn eagerly to the next one, but all you have directly learnt from it is, that the author is a diverting fellow, of fine taste and discrimination. It must not be assumed, because Mr. Walkley never talks seriously, that he has no serious views about literature. His critical opinions are really both serious and sound. We could imagine him capable of perishing at the stake for them. He gibes at sufferers from a complaint which he calls literaturitis, yet he is "down" with the "sickly disease" himself, as he well knows. In strict truth literature is the grande passion of his existence; but he leads a double life, and tries to conceal the traces of that passion. Vain effort! Whatever his tongue may be, we divine that his heart is serious, and with all his gay cynicism he is never false to its dictates. His natural talent for criticism is greater, probably, than Mr. Archer's, did he care to take it out of its napkin. The admirable and illuminative essay on Mr. G. B. Shaw as a dramatist shows what he can do in pure expository criticism when he permits himself to be even a little in earnest. But his frames of mind are seldom of this pattern. Let us not therefore grieve. Seriousness abounds in the world; not so the gentle placidity of benevolent-malicious smiles.

The range of Mr. Frederick Wedmore is wider than that of most of his contemporary chroniqueurs. It apparently includes all arts: he writes with equal fluency upon "The Short Story" and "Dutch Seventeenth-century Drawings," upon "The Duchess of Malfi" and Méryon's etch-ings of Paris. Mr. Wedmore is the type of the dilettante. During an apprenticeship of many years he has learnt to distinguish a good thing from a bad one, and the mere presence of good things is a pleasure to him. He likes to have them round him, and to talk of them amiably, but not deeply, with people who can understand the dialect of the dilettante. In an account of a visit to Goncourt's famous collection of "art treasures" at Auteuil, he says: "Edmond de Goncourt moved about among his portfolios, saying a word here, and there directing a glance. The history of his life surrounded him . . ." That is Mr. Wedmore in this book. His manner is bland, carefully cultured, leisurely; he enjoys the sensation of approaching a fact by means of a winding avenue of words. His critical reflections, without being original, are unexceptionable. Here is one: "Thus does 'Gyp' skim airily over the deep, great sea of life. All are shallows to her vision. And as she skims you feel her lightness. I prefer the adventure of the diver, who knows what the depths are: who plunges, and who rescues the pearl." Yet we should doubt if Mr. Wedmore really would prefer the adventure of the diver if it came to the point.

Iron and Irony.

The Life of Wellington: The Restoration of the Martial Power of Great Britain. By the Right Hon. Sir Herbert Maxwell. (Sampson Low. 36s.)

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL is an expert literary man, and he has produced a well-written biography, to which the publishers have added the equipments of maps and illustrations which should lend visual lustre to the work. In short, we have here a laborious, workmanlike biography, remarkable rather for the correctness and industry of its execution than for any marked originality of treatment. No fuller or sounder work on Wellington is likely to be called for. The second Duke of Wellington said to John Murray: "I cannot write my father's life, but I can at least see that the material is there for a biographer some day." He accordingly edited fourteen volumes of the Duke's military despatches, which, with the volumes already compiled by Colonel Gurdon, formed a complete budget of first-hand information about Wellington the soldier. He also edited eight volumes of civil correspondence. In all, there are thirty-four volumes of these original documents. We are unable to guess what manner of biographer could use all this material with finality. Military experts will always go to the despatches to see Wellington fight his battles, and historians will always go to his civil correspondence and his speeches to study Wellington's influence on the social and political life of England. There remains undoubtedly the need for a comprehensive, available biography which shall embrace the whole career of the Duke of Wellington, and supply clues to further study. This need Sir Herbert Maxwell has worthily supplied. His conscientious care is perceptible in every page. Both the military and the political Wellington take shape and substance in these voluminous pages. Nevertheless, had Sir Herbert Maxwell's brains been put at our service in this matter, we think we should have required of him a different kind of book. We should have set him the more literary, and, we imagine, the more congenial, task of writing a book on the Duke's superb character rather than his career. We should have required of him a psychological commentary on the Duke's success, rather than a history of that success.

However, the book we wish shines through the book we have. Sir Herbert Maxwell, for instance, has written a full-dress biographer's account of the Battle of Waterloo. He has done this admirably. In its context the following sentence arrives with a thrill and weight which only a practised writer could secure for it:

When Wellington recognised the supreme moment, he rode forward to the crest of the ground, and, above the smoke-wreaths, clearly defined as a bronze statue against the bright western sky, held his cocked hat aloft and forward.

Yet with a frank and correct insight Sir Herbert Maxwell concludes his long, well-wrought story of Waterloo by remarking that the Duke's own account, written in a single paragraph to Lord Beresford, an old comrade in arms, condenses the whole matter and is stamped with personality. Here is the Duke's Waterloo:

You will have heard of our battle of the 18th. Never did I see such a pounding match. Both were what the boxers call gluttons. Napoleon did not manoeuvre at all. He just moved forward in the old style, and was driven off in the old style. The only difference was that he mixed cavalry with his infantry, and supported both with an enormous quantity of artillery. I had the infantry for some time in squares, and we had the French cavalry walking about us as if they had been our own. I never saw the British infantry behave so well.

To thousands of Englishmen this passage, and the Wellington it reveals, are comparatively unfamiliar. Here is a fragment from a conversation, in which Lady Salisbury (mother of the present Premier) tried to probe the Duke's feelings of pride in his victory:

LADY SALISBURY.—But now, while you were riding there, did it never occur to you that you had placed yourself on a pinnacle of glory?

THE DUKE.—No. I was entirely occupied with what was necessary to be done. At the door of my own hotel, I met Creevey. They had no certain news at Brussels, and he called out to me: "What news?" I said: "Why, I think we've done for 'em this time." . . . But it was not till ten or twelve days after the battle that I began to reflect on what I had done, and to feel it. . . .

LADY SALISBURY.—But there must be a lasting satisfaction in that feeling of superiority you always enjoy. It is not in human nature it should be otherwise.

THE DUKE.—True. Still, I come constantly into contact with other persons on equal or inferior terms. Perhaps there is no man now existing who would like to meet me on a field of battle; in that line I am superior. But when the war is over and the troops disbanded, what is your great general more than anybody else?

This was undoubtedly the Duke's sincere mind. As a matter of fact he never quite left the field of battle and therefore never put off the feeling of superiority. He lectured his Cabinet, and awed everybody. When his son, Lord Douro, failed to satisfy his washerwoman's claims, that lady had the enterprise to complain to the Duke. The Duke replied as follows:

"The Duke of Wellington presents his compliments to Mrs. Herrick. His son, the Marquis of Douro, is a house-keeper in Belgrave-street. He is not responsible for the payment of his washing bills, even to the wife of a soldier. It appears to the Duke that the regular mode of proceeding would be to apply to the debtor himself, and, if payment should be refused or omitted, to enforce the same by all means sanctioned by law. This would be a regular mode of proceeding. That adopted is impertinent, in the real and not offensive meaning of the word."

How characteristic is the Duke's unbending refusal, in his last sentence, to find and use the word that would be intelligible to a washerwoman. He uses his own word, adding an explanation which might or might not do its work.

The efficiency and sufficiency of the Duke's character are interesting in all their manifestations. When a critical debate was in progress, on which the fate of Peel's ministry hung, the Duke sat unmoved in Apsley House, entertaining the Austrian Ambassador.

Lord Lyndhurst offered to send early information of the result of the division.

"I am quite satisfied," said the Duke, "to have it when the newspapers come in at ten o'clock. If I could do any good by having it earlier, I would; but as I can't, I'd just as soon wait."

"You take things coolly," interposed Lady Salisbury. "I suppose you never lie awake with anxiety?"

"No," replied the Duke, "I don't like lying awake; it does no good. I make a point never to lie awake."

Of course, Wellington's efficiency and sufficiency did not pervade his career with atmospheric ubiquity. His marriage was not too happy; he who never lost a gun for England lost much at his own hearth. His wife, whom he married under a chivalrous impulse rather than with considered choice, proved an indifferent companion. As Sir Herbert Maxwell says:

Wellington's life, with all its stir and activity, was a lone one; his sense of having missed something in the lottery of marriage is revealed by a casual remark in one of his conversations. Lady Salisbury asked him whether Lady Peel had any influence over Sir Robert.

"No," he replied; "she is not a clever woman: Peel had no wish to marry a clever woman."

"It is very curious," remarked Lady Salisbury, "that a man of ability should not care to have a wife capable of entering into subjects in which he takes an interest."

"Aye," said the Duke, "and of anticipating one's meaning; that is what a clever woman does—she sees what you mean."

Two women were clever enough to understand the Duke and to win his confidence: Mrs. Arbuthnot and the second Marchioness of Salisbury. They deserved his trust and affection. Yet no man was ever less influenced by women than Wellington. He treated women "either as agreeable companions or playthings." Even the amiable weakness—one does not know what other name to give it—which led him to correspond for seventeen years with the mysterious "Miss J." scarcely amounts to an exception: the issues of the acquaintance were so trivial. Sir Herbert Maxwell has done well to treat this episode with frankness. Miss J. was a beautiful girl who by her ministrations had brought a hardened murderer, named Cook, to repentance on the eve of his execution. The moment Cook was hanged Miss J. conceived him as "a glorious spirit." Proud of her work, she next turned to the Duke of Wellington, although she did not even know that he was the conqueror of Napoleon. He granted her strange request for an interview, and called on her at the house near Piccadilly, where she lodged with a relative. Miss J. was then twenty years of age, and the Duke sixty-five. A correspondence began which lasted from 1834 to 1851, and drew from the Duke no fewer than 390 letters. Miss J.'s letters were even more numerous. She besought the Duke to seek eternal salvation, and to make her Duchess of Wellington in which character she could the more surely direct him in the heavenly way. The Duke's letters taken individually are patient and discreet. But it is clear that he often regretted having written them. "I am very glad," he writes, "that you intend to send back all the letters I ever wrote to you." The genuineness of the Duke's letters is beyond reasonable doubt, both Sir William Fraser and Sir Herbert Maxwell being satisfied that he wrote them. Every life has more of drama and irony than we know. And perhaps the dramatic fitness of things required that a "Miss J." should think of the great Duke only as having a soul to be saved, and that when his august life was closed, and his bier was being borne under "the golden cross," one faithful, fanatical woman should breathe the hope that the leader of men had joined Cook at the Throne.

The Homeric Hymns.

The Homeric Hymns. Translated by Andrew Lang. (Allen. 7s. 6d.)

THE Homeric Hymns, as even the critics of Alexandria knew, are not particularly Homeric. They are all a great deal later than Homer, whoever Homer may have been, and some of them suggest rather the Hesiodic than the Homeric model of the hexameter. It is true that twenty-seven out of the thirty-three are of the nature of invocations used by rhapsodists as preludes to the recitation of Homeric lays. But these twenty-seven are brief and insignificant, and the six great hymns, one each to Apollo, Hermes, Aphrodite, Demeter, Dionysus, and Hermes, probably belong to the cult of these deities, and were sung at the great festivals before their shrines. Thus the hymn to Apollo is really two hymns, one clearly traceable to Delphi, the other to the rival centre of Hellenic sun-worship in the isle of Delos; the hymn to Demeter is connected with the mysteries of the agricultural deities at Eleusis; that to Hermes records the celebrated theft of the cattle of the Sun by the god when still a child in the cradle. Hermes, of course, as Prof. Rhys has pointed out, does not belong to the older cycle of Aryan deities. He is like the Teutonic Woden, a god of the second generation, a man-god or culture-hero; and in his cattle-lifting exploit, as in the parallel theft of heavenly fire by Prometheus, you have a myth of the winning of the gifts of civilisation for his fellow-men, which is the especial function of the culture-hero. Most of the longer hymns are too long to quote: here is the briefest, the hymn to Ares:

Ares, thou that excellest in might, thou lord of the chariot of war, God of the golden helm, thou mighty of heart, thou shield-bearer, thou safety of cities, thou that smitest in mail; strong of hand and unwearied valiant spearman, bulwark of Olympus, father of victory, champion of Themis; thou tyrannous to them that oppose thee with force; thou leader of just men, thou master of manhood, thou that whirlest thy flaming sphere among the courses of the seven stars of the sky, where thy fiery steeds ever bear thee above the third orbit of heaven; do thou listen to me, helper of mortals, giver of the bright bloom of youth. Shed thou down a mild light from above upon this life of mine, and my martial strength, so that I may be of avail to drive away bitter cowardice from my head, and to curb the deceitful rush of my soul, and to restrain the sharp stress of anger which spurs me on to take part in the dread din of battle. But give me heart, O blessed one, to abide in the painless measures of peace, avoiding the battle-cry of foes and the compelling fates of death.

Homeric or not Homeric, the Hymns are abundantly welcome in Mr. Lang's charming translation as a supplement to the standard translations which, in company with other scholars, he has already given us of the Iliad and the Odyssey. Mr. Lang's defence of the style of diction adopted in all three books is at once amusing and superfluous. "I cannot," he says, "render a speech of Anchises thus:

"If you really are merely a mortal, and if a woman of the mortal kind was your mother, while your father (as you lay it down) was the well-known Otreus, and if you come here all through an undying person, Hermes; and if you are to be known henceforward as my wife—why, then nobody, mortal or immortal, shall interfere with my intention to take instant advantage of the situation."

For our part we are more than satisfied with the alternative rendering which Mr. Lang can bring himself to give:

If indeed thou art mortal, and a mortal mother bore thee, and if renowned Otreus is thy father, and if thou art come hither by the will of Hermes, the immortal Guide, and art to be called my wife for ever, then neither mortal man nor immortal God shall hold me from my desire, before I lie with thee in love, now and anon.

Mr. Lang's introductory essays deal in a somewhat desultory and occasionally disjointed fashion with some problems as to the nature of Greek religion suggested by the Hymns. They take him over ground which he and we have trodden before, and we only note now that he is still impenitent in the heresy which would derive the idea of a god, not by natural evolution from more primitive animistic conceptions, but from the Paley-like musings of early man on the necessity for some supreme creator of things in general. We do not propose to renew the controversy here. It is more pleasing to lay stress on another point made by Mr. Lang—that, however crude and primitive the origin of Greek religion may have been, that religion, as ultimately developed, did not lack profound moral and spiritual elements. In the Eleusinian Mysteries, for instance:

The initiate "live a pious life in regard to strangers and citizens." They are to be "conscious of no evil"; they are to "protect such as have wrought no unrighteousness." Such precepts "have their root in the ethico-religious consciousness." It is not mere ritual purity that the Mysteries demand, either among naked Australians, or Yao, or in Greece. Lobeck did his best to minimise the testimony to the higher element in the Eleusinia, but without avail. The study of early, barbaric, savage, classical, Egyptian, or Indian religions should not be one-sided. Men have always been men, for good as well as for evil; and religion, almost everywhere, is allied with ethics no less than it is overrun by the parasite of myth, and the survival of magic in ritual.

Three Country Books.

Outside the Garden. By Helen Milman. (Lane. 5s. net.)

Among English Hedgerows. By Clifton Johnson. (Macmillan.)

Country Matters in Short. By W. F. Collier. (Duckworth. 3s. 6d.)

IN the three books before us we have three examples of the open-air author. Helen Milman (Mrs. Caldwell Crofton) is the facile essayist and sentimental nature lover who is content to play with the charming generalities and commonplaces of the life of the fields and lanes, of birds and flowers. A new book does not with her involve new observation: she has it all at her finger-ends. We do not mean that she is a mere mechanical eulogist of rural happiness; her joy in it is sincere, and her desire to pass on her delight to others is sincere too; but her work is valuable only so far as it is beautifully done. Judged by this standard it is somewhat defective, for Mrs. Crofton allies to a loving interest and enthusiasm for Nature no particular distinction of style (she can even speak of a "dilapidated Scotch fir"). But there is much in her pages that is pretty. We quote a passage relating to the woods in March:

Nature awakes with a start. Over the woods there come creeping tinges of purple and yellow. The pulse of life is felt there. From time to time the rich melodious voice of the blackbird is heard as he rests for a few hours from the labour of building, while the missel-thrush, whose nest at the very top of a holly-tree is finished, sings daily less and less, for he is a bird of storm and wind, so fine warmer days silence him.

Gay, bright chaffinches have returned from homesteads, and on sunny mornings may be heard trying their utmost to accomplish the last turn of a somewhat monotonous song—which needs a deal of practice yet.

In the rookery bustle and worry daily increase, for many of the nests now contain eggs, and these afford opportunities for conversation and gossip which parent birds do not neglect, and much cawing and croaking "baby talk" ensues over these new treasures.

There is, as we have said, a certain prettiness here; but it is on the cards that enough books of the kind have been written. They take us no "forrarder"; there is not enough stuff to them. We ought to add that Mr. New has put some pleasant cuts to these pages; but it is clear that his curiously severe method does not suit everything. He is better among houses than trees.

Mr. Clifton Johnson, the second author on our list, is one whose work is valuable in proportion to its truthfulness. He is the descriptive traveller who passes through a country taking notes. If his eyes are sound his book is good, for it matters almost nothing whether he writes well or ill. Mr. Johnson is an American, and apparently the latest recruit to the little band of observing Americans who have written well of England—a band which includes Washington Irving and Nathaniel Hawthorne, Mrs. Stowe and N. P. Willis, Mr. John Burroughs and Mr. William Winter. Of all these, and others whom we have not named, Mr. Johnson is the most naively informing. By presupposing in his American readers almost no knowledge at all of English country customs, his book has upon us a curiously quaint effect. The effect, of course, is one which must necessarily follow perusal by a native of any work describing the characteristics of his own nation; and the readers of some much-described nations must be very familiar with it. But it is comparatively novel to us, because by most commentators on the English more is taken for granted than Mr. Clifton Johnson takes. We are not accustomed now, although once it was a common experience—at the time of Voltaire's letters on England, for example—to such a sentence as this in Mr. Johnson's book: "The English, when they want to travel on foot anywhere, . . . are apt to go, not by road, but by foot-path." It is so natural a proceeding that we never expected to see it noted in print at all—at any rate, in this informing, pedagogic way. It is his store of small facts that makes Mr. Johnson's book valuable. He does not write particularly well—he has not very striking charm or humour; but you lay his book aside with a very pleasant feeling. England at her simplest and quietest and least sullied has been the theme, and you have been reminded of so much that is sweet. Were the book shorter it might be still more agreeable, for Mr. Johnson suffers from the limitation that so often mars the chroniclers of small beer—he does not quite know what to omit. The episode of Mr. Starkey, for example, in this volume is naught. Another objection to the English reader is the author's Americanisms, as in this account of the game of cricket:

At first glance you might think that you were looking at a baseball field. Then you noted the flat-bladed bats and the three-barred wickets at each end of the field back of the batsman. Behind each wicket was a man to throw the ball. He swings it out at arm's length above his head, something the way girls throw, only not so gently and timidly. It goes like a cannon-ball, and is about as comfortable to get hit with. What the batsman wants to do is to give the ball a long rap [not always], so that he and his fellow-batsman down at the other end can get some runs back and forth between the wickets. What the other side wants to do is to have the ball when it is thrown hit the wicket the batsman is protecting, or to catch the ball he has batted.

And so on. Mr. Johnson's manner, it will be seen, recalls a much earlier type of literature. There is something in this description of cricket not unlike the writing to be found in the volumes of selections from Forgotten Children's Books which Mr. Tuer has recently edited. But this archaism, except where rendered ugly by such American idioms as "back of," is in keeping with the subject and is rather refreshing. Mr. Johnson's photographs are very good and well chosen. One mistake, among several, we would point out to him: the old rhyme,

In April,
Come she will,

and so forth, was not written of the nightingale, as he states, but of the cuckoo.

This rhyme, by the way, will be found with its correct application in Mr. W. F. Collier's Country Matters in Short, the third book on our list, and also the best; or, at least, the one upon which the most mind has been directed. For Mr. Collier is one who writes with authority. The value of him resides not, as with Mrs. Crofton, in the beauty of his style, not, as with Mr. Johnson, in the accuracy of his vision, but in his knowledge. He has written this book because he has something definite to say on certain things. It would not matter very much how poorly he wrote, provided his information was sound; but fortunately his prose is sinewy and well-knit. The best essays, such as "The Tongue of the Hound" (though why did not Mr. Collier quote one of those melodious and very pertinent passages from Gervase Markham?) and "Cub Hunting" and "Otter Hunting" and "The Chastity of Flowers," are excellent, alike in matter and manner. We quote, from "Cub Hunting," a specimen of Mr. Collier's quality:

To enjoy cub-hunting is not to enjoy one's bed. The huntsman at break of day takes out a very large pack of mixed, young and old, hounds, and meets his master at the appointed place, which would be near a covert wherein litters of cubs are known to be. His young hounds as yet are strangers to the fox, but are full of life, fun, and frolic, and have, when out at walk, been hunting anything they pleased. A hound, with such an exquisite nose as he has, must hunt something. Now they have to learn not only what a fox is, but what everything else is not. The young hounds have a tendency to follow the huntsman as their particular friend; but he knows that the spirit within them will not allow them to remain quiet; he therefore makes himself as dull and silent as possible. If he hustled about, blowing his horn, and craming to the front, the young hounds would think it good fun of itself. But as he remains very quiet after having sent the old hounds into the covert, the young hounds vote it dull, and are eager to go to the first tongue they hear just to see what is going on. Soon the hounds open in full chorus, and the cubs are scattered all over the covert; the old foxes have gone away by virtue of their experience of last season, and if a few hounds get on their line they are stopped by the whips. A cub soon falls a victim to his want of knowledge of the world, and the young hounds learn what blood is. A great fuss is made over the body of the dead cub, to impress the young hounds with the idea that these funereal rites are the main objects of life.

Of a different quality is "The Chastity of Flowers," wherein Mr. Collier ventures upon the waters of Shakespearean criticism. Says Titania:

The moon, methinks, looks with a watery eye;
And when she weeps, weeps every little flower,
Lamenting some enforced chastity.

There are two ways of taking this passage—either as a beautiful Shakespearean fancy, touched with the exquisite tenderness of which he had the secret, or as the enunciation by prevision of a scientific truth. For, says Mr. Collier, it is a fact now known to botanists, but not known to them until after Shakespeare's day, that "when the moon looks watery there is a weeping of the heavens; the bee, the moth, and the fly do not flit from the male blossom to the female blossom in the rain; the flowers thus remain chaste, the wedlock of the male and female blossom is not celebrated, their chastity is enforced by the state of the weather, the flowers remain maids perhaps until it is too late, and they die a fruitless death, a most affecting cause for lamentation."

Mr. Collier holds that Shakespeare gave the hint to the men of science, Millington and Grew, who, in the seventeenth century, first observed that the sexual system pervaded the vegetable world as well as the animal. Huxley, however, to whom he sent his essay, was politely sceptical, as readers of the ACADEMY have already had an opportunity of seeing. But Mr. Collier is not to be dissuaded: he sticks nobly to his belief in Shakespeare's intuition, and we prefer to believe in it too.

Six Thinkers.

Distribution of Income. By Prof. William Smart. (Macmillan. 5s. net.)

PROF. SMART, the author of Distribution of Income, tells us that for years he shrank from grappling in earnest with the supreme problem of distribution, and his readers will fully appreciate his diffidence in launching forth into what has become the stormy ocean of economics. The "old masters" were almost entirely taken up with the factors of production, and framed profound formulas about it; but the "new economic men" leave production to take care of itself and concentrate all their attention on distribution. With these new lights distribution takes the form of politico-ethical schemes for distributing the good things of this world all round without any particular reference to deserts or services rendered. Prof. Smart does not fall in with the present stream of tendencies, and does not include himself among the "new economic men"; though we remember the time when he taught "celestial economics" and dwelt much upon the necessity of seasoning the so-called "dismal science" with ethics. But the Professor has got rid of all such questionable baggage, and, at the risk of offending former friends and associates, he declares boldly that, as an honest man, he believes the present system of distribution to be, with all its imperfections, infinitely preferable to all the visionary schemes yet propounded by Socialists, Collectivists, and lyrical enthusiasts generally. No doubt under the present system many rich men get more than they deserve, just as many poor people get more than they are worth; but on the whole there is a rough justice about the present social state which inclines the Professor to the view that "'Tis better to bear the ills we have than fly to others that we know not of." The book cannot fail to be widely read and freely criticised; but its vast stores of fact and wealth of apt illustration will enable it to maintain a high position as a profound exposition of an important economic and sociologic problem.

In his preface Prof. Smart has something to say about his wife; and since John Stuart Mill led off in that way, it seems marvellous what a great part women have played in political economy. Prof. Smart is, however, very modest, and in this, as in other things, he keeps well within the domain of sober fact, for he merely thanks his wife for having given him the necessary conditions of continuous quiet work—the peace of home. And according to Prof. Bain (Mill's best biographer) that was all Mrs. Mill was capable of giving her distinguished husband, notwithstanding the extraordinary eulogiums passed upon her by the great philosopher.

The Conscience of the King. By J. C. Spence. (Sonnenschein. 6s.)

WE are all more or less aware of the fact that legislators make mistakes, and that, though at times actuated by the best possible intentions, their schemes miss the mark, and, in many cases, do positive harm instead of good. Few people, however, have either the inclination or the ability to get at the root of the mystery of politics, and are content with the hope that things will ultimately come all right with a few extra shuffles of the political cards. Mr. J. C. Spence does not view the sins of legislators in this light-hearted way, and in The Conscience of the King he sets himself resolutely to the task of ascertaining how it happens that bad and foolish laws are enacted by honest and sensible men. And Mr. Spence comes to the conclusion that the forces which keep a man in the right course in private life cease to act when he enters the political arena, or, as he himself would phrase it, the follies of legislators may all be traced to political dementia—an abnormal state of mind and morals. The eminent French writer, M. Gustave Le Bon, has been telling us pretty much the same thing for some time past. We mention this not to detract in any way from the merit of Mr. Spence's book, but rather to show that, though his conclusions may appear startling to some, they can be supported by the authority of a great name. In other respects the book is fresh and vigorous, and is, in point of fact, the most telling, from the individualistic point of view, that has appeared in this country since Mr. Herbert Spencer launched his formidable indictment, The Man versus the State. Mr. Spence is a clear and accurate reasoner; but he rightly trusts more to examples, to actual specimens of legislative folly, than to formal argument. But though clear-headed and very matter-of-fact, he is surely in error when he states that all that is wanted to make legislators mend their ways is simply a little more of what he calls "careful consideration." Mr. Spence forgets that "It is a mad world, my masters," and that, after all, reason plays but a small part in the affairs of men.

Researches in Economics. By Prof. Nys. (Black. 6s.)

AN English version of Researches in the History of Economics, by Prof. Nys, of Brussels, is well timed, and sure to be widely read by the vast and increasing number of people who take an interest in politico-economic problems. For the Professor has a solid European reputation as an authority on economics and international law; and he is an able representative of that historical method of research which has achieved so many triumphs at the hands of English investigators. Though he does not say so, it is only too evident that he has caught the true evolutionary note, which consists in pedigreering ideas and institutions, and carefully studying the past in order to understand the present. Working on these lines the Professor sketches the origin and growth of the economic problems which have been born in the heart of European society, and his narrative forms a brilliant history of the development of the great civilised nations. The book is throughout permeated so much with the spirit of the unbiassed investigator, and is so attractively written, that we have nothing but praise for its author.

English Political Philosophy. By Prof. W. Graham. (Arnold. Net, 10s. 6d.)

PROF. GRAHAM, whose Creed of Science and Socialism New and Old are well known to students, has, under the title of English Political Philosophy from Hobbes to Maine, laid down and expounded the first principles of the creed political. The distribution of political power and the increase of political knowledge have not, as some people imagine, gone on pari passu, and there is certainly scope for a good deal of missionary work in taking people out of the regions of vague impressions, and enabling them to acquire a surer grasp of political principles. Huxley used to lament that the works of Sir Henry Maine were unknown to Demos and the leaders of Demos; but we are inclined to think that not only Maine, but Locke and J. S. Mill, and all the great masters, are more spoken about than read nowadays. This is unfortunate, for, as Mr. Lecky is never weary of telling us, the wide extension of the franchise has placed the whole wealth of the country within the grasp of the masses, and our safety lies in the wide dissemination of knowledge and good sense. Prof. Graham seems to share this opinion, and his book will enable the average citizen to obtain a clear insight into the principles which ought to guide citizens in their relations to government and to each other. He selects six political thinkers—namely, Hobbes, Locke, Burke, Bentham, J. S. Mill and Henry Maine—and gives us abstracts and analyses of the famous, but far too little read, books of these eminent writers, with, in addition, a running critical commentary of his own. The abstracts are certainly very accurately done, and the connecting narrative and criticism being clearly written and free from difficult terminology, the general reader will find his introduction to what are usually regarded as dry books made pleasant and interesting. But while we greatly admire the author's work as an expositor, we do not always share his conclusions. He appears to us to be slightly tainted with that unbounded optimism which he rightly considers the besetting sin of J. S. Mill; and his lengthy treatment of the philosophy of the French Revolution suffers a little from not being seasoned with the masterly knowledge of M. Taine's monumental works. We are, however, thankful for what he has done outside the domain of criticism—namely, a brilliant account of the political theories of the greater English political thinkers.

The Social Philosophy of Rodbertus. By Prof. Gonner. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.)

PROF. GONNER, of Liverpool, has prepared an exposition of the social and economic teaching of one who, though little heard of in this country, has a high reputation in Germany. Rodbertus was a thoroughgoing Socialist, in that he viewed such questions as value, land and rent, capital and distribution, from the socialistic standpoint; but in other respects he differed materially from the vast majority of writers on Socialism. He was not onesided, for he relied largely on the historical method in treating social and economic problems; and he had nothing visionary about him, for he believed that Socialism was incapable of immediate realisation, and can only be safely brought about by the gradual adjustment of humanity to the higher social state. Those who desire to know what can be said for Socialism by one who has some claim to be regarded as a philosophic historian will find what they are in search of in Prof. Gonner's carefully prepared volume.

A System of Ethics. By Prof. Paulsen. (Kegan Paul. 18s. net.)

PROF. PAULSEN, of Berlin, does not own allegiance to any school of ethics with which we are acquainted, but marches sturdily under his own flag, as becomes a bold, independent thinker. On some points he is in sharp conflict with English ethical authorities, while on others he is in perfect harmony with them. Even on subject matter he takes his own way, and makes ethics include much that is usually associated with philosophy, sociology, and economics. The result is that his System of Ethics is indeed a remarkable book, and admirably adapted for those it is intended for—namely, people who want useful practical help in solving the problems of life. Most ethical works are somewhat hard reading, but there is not a dull page in Paulsen's book. The translation is by the author's warm American friend and admirer, Prof. Thilly.

Other New Books.

AT SCHOOL AND AT SEA. BY "MARTELLO TOWER."

We do not know who "Martello Tower" may be; but, from the internal evidence of a book which has given us considerable pleasure, we gather that he was at Harrow in the days when Dr. Wordsworth had let the numbers down to sixty-five, went into the Navy some time in the forties, has had a most amusing life, and is still the sort of man one welcomes at a dinner party. That is the impression given by his book, which is genial and full of suggestion. Parents who are struggling to get their sons into the Navy, boys who are cramming for the entrance examination, will regret the forties. The author was watching "Box and Cox" at the Lyceum when a relative put a blue envelope into his hand. A year before he had expressed a wish to enter the Navy. He was appointed a cadet of H.M.S. Cuba—subject to examination. He went down, on a little passenger steamer, to the Nore, when the captain of H.M.S. Atlantic made him read a few lines from a leading article in the morning paper, and write a few more from dictation. Then, as, according to the instructions, "a naval cadet must be tested in arithmetic and the rule of three," he was asked the price of  $2\frac{1}{4}$  pounds of sugar at the rate of half a hundredweight for a guinea. The captain noticed his difficulty.

"Hulloa, youngster!" he exclaimed, looking over my shoulder; "you don't seem to be making much headway. Why, what's this—fractions?" At the sight of my sum a feeling of sympathy for the oppressed—ever characteristic of the brave—was instantly kindled in the heart of that honest tar, for fractions were an old personal enemy of his. "Why," he indignantly demanded, "have you given him fractions? He hasn't got to do them." The master who had set the sum explained that it was not a difficult sum; that the fraction was really nothing at all; that I ought to be able to do the sum easily, &c., &c. "That's not the point," roared Bunn angrily, rapping the table with a vehemence which made the red, white, and blue wafers of the period vibrate in their receptacle; "the point is, do the instructions say that the boy must pass in fractions, or do they not? Bring me the Instructions!" A terrified clerk produced the book, opened the page, and handed it to his chief, who, glancing at it, exclaimed: "Ha! didn't I tell you so? nothing about fractions!"

So the boy passed, and had an amusing time on H.M.S. Cuba, which was, of course, one of the old sailing men-of-war; he had an amusing time even in the trenches before Sebastopol when he served in the Naval Brigade; and where the men were kept free from dysentery, when the medicine-chest was empty, by bread pills—mixed with faith. And now, when all these things are a mere memory, he has given us a really amusing book about them. (Murray. 16s.)

NOTES OF AN OUTLOOK ON LIFE.

BY ALEXANDER GARDINER MERCER.

This book consists of extracts from the private MSS. of the late Dr. Mercer, of Newport, Rhode Island. Dr. Mercer was rector of Trinity Church at Newport, that centre of wealth and social gaiety. Here he won a great reputation as a preacher, and his society was much sought and appreciated. Dr. Mercer presented a bust of Coleridge to Westminster Abbey. These "Notes" are rightly so named. They are notes rather than finished aphorisms—indeed, their style has often the awkwardness of a first draft written with effort. They are memoranda to be used by the writer, not thoughts presented to a reader, and the insight they afford into Dr. Mercer's mind will be appreciated most by those who knew him in life. Here are a few of his reflections, taken very much at random:

Where it is a woman's interest to conceal, the least thing means much; where it is her interest to give demonstrations, the greatest things mean little.

All the ways of life exhibit at bottom but one effort, the bastard effort to escape from our destiny. Gambling is one of the outlets in which the romance of the world comes out.

A man may live all his life and never hear the word which should be spoken to him.

What a man says to his wife is commonly the test of what is his charitable temper; for there is many a good tongue which is fashioned by fear.

There is more truth, and of course more merit, in the most unwise of great writers, like Warburton, who are totally neglected—than in an army of public favourites. After the accepted great, read the rejected great, before you touch the common.

The man who has mastered the individual problem, how best to put the force used into a substantial result, has become far more than a match for much more gifted men.

Few people are conscious of how much the mind is distracted as a habit, and can't be made conscious until the thorough quiet of a fit of sickness, or a far, long removal from familiar scenes.

Fiction.

No Soul Above Money. By Walter Raymond.
(Longmans. 6s.)

IN this novel Mr. Raymond gives us another picture of eighteenth century village life very similar in atmosphere and composition to that presented in Two Men o' Mendip, issued only about six months ago. It is a work full of calm and simple distinction, beginning with the quietude of hope, ending with the quietude of disastrous sorrow, and containing midway one moment of fierce and terrible tragedy. Apart from its contrast with the rest of the book, the night scene in which Jack White kills his brother and loses the corpse in his frantic efforts to hide it will not easily be forgotten. It is invented with an original, fertile resource of which we had deemed Mr. Raymond scarcely capable; and the imagination which has clothed the naked ingenuity of invention is of a majestic order—it glows with the fire of tragic passion. We do not use these phrases lightly. No Soul Above Money is a better book than Two Men o' Mendip, and that was fine. It is a notable book, the production of a serious and capable artist at his maturity. It is the work of a man who has dug at the deep roots of English rural life and character; who renders to us the essential intimate England, the England of the "folk," the same almost to-day as it was a hundred years ago, when every grown man of a village had to touch the corpse of a murdered wight in order to establish his innocence before constable and justice of the peace. Mr. Raymond's qualities of sobriety and profound artistic honesty, while they will militate against a general popular acceptance, should commend him to an audience worth cultivating. We should hesitate to say that his imagination is of the first class, but it is of a very high class; and on the plane on which he chooses to move he moves well nigh perfectly. Consider No Soul Above Money; regard it in detail, from the summer dawn in which Mrs. White parts in hope from her elder son, to the night in which, a crone prematurely aged, she haunts the gibbet of her younger son in order to collect the lad's bones as they drop: you cannot find fault with it. You may say that the opening chapters might have been something different, something warmer and more vivid, something with a quicker pulse; but then the whole book would have changed, and Mr. Raymond would not be Mr. Raymond. Largely conceived, and executed with a power that knows its scope absolutely, No Soul Above Money is a novel which demands, and will receive, a special attention from those who can tell art from artifice, strength from bluster, and music from noise. We should like to quote from it, but it happens to be one of those homogeneous, well-kneaded books, from which a fragment cannot be satisfactorily cut away. It has no "purple patches."

Mr. Raymond might have chosen a better title. He is not, indeed, too often fortunate in his titles. Even granting that the miser, Jacob Handsford, is the chief personage in the book—which he is not—there is neither dignity nor harmonious sound in a phrase like No Soul Above Money. It reminds us of Cometh Up as a Flower and Ought We to Visit Her?

The Pursuit of Camilla. By Clementina Black.
(Pearson. 6s.)

THIS is a quite amusing story of cross-purposes, mysterious disappearances, and attempted assassination, which works itself out in the clear sunshine of Italy. Several people are, very naturally, anxious to marry Camilla, who is both wealthy and beautiful—a young Englishman, a Polish artist, and an Italian marquis. Suddenly Camilla disappears from Saragosta; after seven days is rescued, but almost immediately vanishes again, being arrested for conspiracy against the Italian Government, and refused permission to communicate with her friends.

As she sat, a few minutes later, in the carriage, and was conveyed at rather a deliberate pace along the road, her active mind was busy in considering by what means she should leave a sign for those who would come after her. The carriage turned aside to the left. Camilla, leaning suddenly from the window, cast her parasol out and upward. Then, making a feint of trying to open the door, "Oh, my parasol," she cried. "Do let me get my parasol."

The man, as she had fully expected, saw in this manoeuvre only a clumsy pretext for getting out of the vehicle, and instead of acceding, called to the driver to go faster. The parasol remained hanging, and Camilla was carried onward.

Camilla's parasol plays an important part in the subsequent events, during which we are hurried with her lovers and friends up and down Italy, to London, and even into the British Embassy at Rome, where we meet the most unconventional of ambassadors. Miss Black has a decidedly happy turn for dialogue that is apposite to the story, and amusing without being unnaturally smart. Only in one case does she unduly strain probability: the Polish artist can supply a link of evidence by drawing portraits of people he had only seen for a few moments casually—portraits so convincing that identification is immediate. Can any artist do that? We very much doubt it.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

CHINATOWN STORIES.

BY C. B. FERNALD.

Mr. Fernald is the author of the plays "The Cat and the Cherub" and "The Moonlight Blossom." Here he prints ten stories of Chinese life in San Francisco—humorous, pathetic, and tragic. We wonder how many readers can translate the following piece of Pidgin into English: "Ifittytshimow Jays haddee ny upplonow-shibuh nays. He lote im aw dow witty mottify flow a flewty ho lot itty flays." (Heinemann. 6s.)

THE CHILLINGFIELD CHRONICLES.

BY HÉLÈNE GINGOLD.

We move in upper circles and among the more interesting emotions, very much as in a novelette. "'To the memory of my lord's heart,' cried the girl, and, taking a tiny sip, she let the goblet drop from her hands. It fell upon the ground and broke into a thousand pieces." (The Columbus Co. 6s.)

A COMEDY OF TEMPTATION.

BY TRISTRAM COUTTS.

"'Wha-at?' cried Bernal. 'Am I walking the tiles with a bloated bigamist? Get off this roof, you bald-headed Sultan.'" (Greening. 3s. 6d.)

THE PROFESSIONAL.

BY A. GOODRICH FREER.

The editor is "X" of the Psychical Research Society, and the collaborator with Lord Bute in the account of the haunting of B— House. This is a collection of true ghost stories. (Hurst & Blackett. 3s. 6d.)

We have also received A Claim on Klondike, by Edward Roper (Blackwood, 6s.), an illustrated story of gold-digging, ice, and love; Trespassers Who Were Prosecuted, by Sadi Grant (Digby, Long, 6s.), a fantastic story of diplomatic life in the "Islands of the South Pacific" among improbable duchesses, sultans, and savages; The Tragedy of the Lady Palmist, by W. L. Longstaffe (Greening, 3s. 6d.), a queer, unwholesome narration very remote from life; A Son of Africa, by Anna, Comtesse de Brémont (Greening, 3s. 6d.), a romance of English and native life, savage rites, and tropical environment; Ashes Tell No Tales, by Mrs. Albert Bradshaw, a melodramatic novel (Greening, 3s. 6d.); and A Cry in the Night, by Arnold Golsworthy, a lengthy melodramatic novel (Greening, 3s. 6d.).

The "Academy's" Awards to Authors.

WHILE deciding this year to extend the scope of the ACADEMY's awards to authors, we have somewhat modified the proposal which we made in our issue of last week. Formerly we have set apart the sum of One Hundred Guineas and Fifty Guineas for writers who have published works of signal merit during the year. Still keeping before us the encouragement of sincerity and thoroughness in literary art, we intend this year to devote the same sum of One Hundred and Fifty Guineas to the authors of books published in 1899 which are notable for promise, and which, in our opinion, have not received the recognition they deserve. An author's first book would be the ideal candidate for an award; but we do not bind ourselves to search among first or even second and third books.

The sum of One Hundred and Fifty Guineas will be divided into six portions of Twenty-five Guineas each. These will be awarded to authors of books representing various branches of literature, such as Poetry, Fiction, Biography, History, Belles-Lettres, Research. The awards will be published in our issue of January 20, 1900.

Favourite Books of 1899.

Some More Readers.

As stated last week, we have, in accordance with our annual custom, addressed to a number of well-known men and women a letter, asking each to name the two books which have pleased and interested them most during 1899. We now publish some further replies:

Rev. Dr. H. ADLER, LL.D. (the Chief Rabbi).

Mr. Lecky's The Map of Life, Conduct and Character.

Prof. Dr. Schechter and Dr. Taylor's The Wisdom of Ben Sira, from Hebrew MSS. in the Cairo Genizah Collection.

Prof. EDWARD DOWDEN.

Stephen Phillips's Paolo and Francesca.
Edmund Gosse's Life of Donne.

Mr. STEPHEN PHILLIPS.

I am afraid it is somewhat of a farce for me to attempt an opinion on any books published this year, as I have read scarcely one at all thoroughly. So far, however, as personal taste goes, the Stevenson Letters have fascinated me greatly. I might also mention Mr. Stephen Gwynn's critical estimate of Tennyson.

Mrs. HARRISON ("Lucas Malet").

Tolstoi's La Guerre et la Paix (re-read).

Hawthorne's American Note-books (re-read).

IAN MACLAREN.

David Harum.

Gardiner's Oliver Cromwell.

Mr. ALFRED R. WALLACE.

Elizabeth and her German Garden.

E. Howard's To-morrow: a Peaceful Path to Real Reform.

The Rev. NEWMAN HALL.

Dr. G. A. Smith's Life of Henry Drummond.

Memoir of Principal Henry Reynolds, D.D. By his Sisters.

Mr. J. E. MUDDOCK.

I have read several books this year, but none that have appealed to me so forcibly, or stirred my emotions to such an extent, and in such different ways, as The Transvaal from Within and The Highest Andes.

Mr. SIDNEY LEE.

I have read very few new books this year. None that I have read have given me the impression that they are notable contributions to literature.

Mr. WALTER CRANE.

The Canon.

Bernard Shaw's Plays.

Mr. S. R. CROCKETT.

I think these are—

Dr. Doyle's A Duet.

Robert Louis Stevenson's Letters.

Mr. J. A. SPENDER (Editor of the Westminster Gazette).

Stevenson's Letters.

Morley Roberts's Son of Empire.

Or, if a dead author is permitted, Harold Frederic's Market Place.

Mr. ALFRED HARMSWORTH.

The Transvaal from Within.

Sir Herbert Maxwell's Life of Wellington.

Mr. A. CONAN DOYLE.

Bernard Hamilton's The Light.

Frank Norris's McTeague.

Mr. L. F. AUSTIN.

Richard Whiteing's No. 5 John Street and Maurice Hewlett's Little Novels of Italy are the books which have given me the greatest pleasure.

Mr. ARTHUR R. ROPES ("Adrian Ross").

John C. Ropes's The Story of the (American) Civil War. Vol. II.

I have not had time to read other new books in any numbers, and have not been impressed by those I have read.

Mr. JOSEPH CONRAD.

The two new books which have pleased and interested me most in 1899?

I give it up. Too difficult.

Mr. H. G. WELLS.

G. W. Stevens's In India.

G. W. Stevens's The Dreyfus Tragedy.

Mr. RICHARD LE GALLIENNE.

In Poetry :

W. B. Yeats's Wind among the Reeds.

Mr. JOSEPH KNIGHT (Editor of Notes and Queries).

Spencer & Gillen's Tribes of Central Australia.

Addy's Evolution of the English House.

Mr. W. ALGERNON LOCKER (Editor of the London Letter).

Lord Rosebery's Appreciations and Addresses.

John Martineau's The Transvaal Trouble : Extracts from the Biography of Sir Bartle Frere.

Sir THEODORE MARTIN.

Vol. XII. of the Variorum Shakespeare, edited by Horace Hayward Furness.

Miss Cholmondeley's The Red Pottage.

Mr. GEORGE ALEXANDER.

Stephen Phillips's Paola and Francesca.

Hewlett's The Forest Lovers.

Mary Cholmondeley's Red Pottage.

Mr. COULSON KERNAHAN.

In poetry I plump for Mr. Stephen Phillips's Paola and Francesca. In prose I must ask you to let me split my vote, for really I don't know which has delighted the heart of me more—Mr. Quiller Couch's Ship of Stars or Mr. Kenneth Grahame's Dream Days.

Mr. George Gissing.

An Inquiry.

THE sound reputation of an artist is originally due never to the public, but to the critics. I do not use the word "critic" in a limited, journalistic sense; it is meant to include all those persons, whether scribes or not, who have genuine convictions about an art. The critic's first requisite is that he should be interested. A man may have an instinctive good taste; but if his attitude is one of apathy then he is not a true critic. The opinions of the public are often wrong; the opinions of the critics are usually right. But the fundamental difference between these two bodies does not lie here: it lies in the fact that the critics "care," while the public does not care. The public, by its casual approval, may give notoriety and a vogue which passes; but it is incapable of the sustained ardour of appreciation which alone results in authentic renown. It is incapable because it is nonchalant. To the public art is a very little thing—a distraction, the last resort against ennui. To the critics art looms enormous. They do not merely possess views; they are possessed by them. Their views amount to a creed, and that creed must be spread. Quiescence is torment to the devotee. He cannot cry peace when there is no peace. Passionate conviction, like murder, will out. "I believe; therefore you must believe": that is the motto which moves the world. Keats writes an ode: the critics read it; they are on fire; each is instantly transformed into a missionary. The wide earth must know of that ode; the sky must ring with it. And so the missionaries go about. "Can you not see it, O public? You must see it. You have got to see it. Here is a great ode!" And after thirty-and-three years the public mildly inquires: "What is all this noise about Keats?" And it buys the ode prettily bound, and regards it with a moue, and admits—partly for the sake of quietness, partly from a sense of propriety, and just a little bit from honest liking—that the thing is a masterpiece. And so, by vehement insistence, by unwearied harping, the reputation of Keats is made and kept alive. What applies to Keats applies some time to all artists, of whatever shade or degree. Even if the public happens to begin by acclaiming an artist, he must nevertheless come to the critics for that consolidating warmth of esteem, that quasi-religious devotion, without which there is no permanent security. It may be early, it may be late—the moment surely arrives when, but for the critics, the artist would fall into that neglect which is death. Byron needed no missionaries for half a century; but he needs them now. Keats could not have lived a week without those apostles of the faith.

And neither, to approach the subject at last, could Mr. George Gissing. The author of Demos enjoys a fame today which he certainly deserves, but which he owes to the critics exclusively. His novels contain less of potential popularity than those of almost any other living novelist of rank. They have neither the prettiness which pleases, nor the outward beauty which subdues, nor the wit which dazzles, nor the thematic bigness which overawes. And they are not soiled by any specious lower qualities which might have deceived an innocent public into admiration. There is nothing in them to attract, and much to repel, the general gaze. A West End bookseller and the proprietor of a circulating library said to me: "My ordinary public will have none of Gissing. But I stock his novels. They have a steady, very slow sale. I can tell my 'Gissing' customers at a glance. They may be divided into two classes, the literary and the earnest. By 'earnest' I mean interested in social problems. As for other sorts of people—no, not at all. You see, his subjects are so unattractive. My ordinary public simply doesn't care to read about that kind of thing." Thus the observant bookseller. Yet Mr. Gissing is renowned. He stands for something. His words have authority, and his name carries respect even among "my ordinary public" which will not buy him. He figures often in the magazines, and I have small doubt that he receives higher prices for serial rights than many authors whose editions far outnumber his own. The fact is, he has that peculiar moral significance and weight which exist apart from mere numerical popularity, and which yet have an assessable value in the commercial market. "My ordinary public" may be conceived as saying to him: "We often hear of you. We take you for a serious person of high motives. We are told you are rather fine, but we don't realise it ourselves; to us you are very grey and depressing. We prefer to be more cheerful. Still, we suppose there really is something in you, and since we have heard so much about you, we shall probably look at anything of yours that we may happen to see in the monthlies. In the meantime we leave your books to those who care for them."

It is, of course, just this "grey" quality of his subjects, so repellent to the public, which specially recommends Mr. Gissing's work to the critics. The artists who have courage fully to exploit their own temperaments are always sufficiently infrequent to be peculiarly noticeable and welcome. Still more rare are they who, leaving it to others to sing and emphasise the ideal and obvious beauties which all can in some measure see, will exclusively exercise the artist's prerogative as an explorer of hidden and recondite beauty in unsuspected places. Beauty is strangely various. There is the beauty of light and joy and strength exulting; but there is also the beauty of shade, of sorrow and sadness, and of humility oppressed. The spirit of the sublime dwells not only in the high and remote; it shines unperceived amid all the usual mean-nesses of our daily existence. To take the common grey things which people know and despise, and, without tampering, to disclose their epic significance, their essential grandeur—that is realism, as distinguished from idealism or romanticism. It may scarcely be, it probably is not, the greatest art of all; but it is art, precious and indisputable. Such art has Mr. Gissing accomplished. In The Nether World, his most characteristic book, the myriad squalid futilities of an industrial quarter of London are gathered up into a large coherent movement of which the sinister and pathetic beauty is but too stringently apparent. After The Nether World Clerkenwell is no longer negligible. It has import. You feel the sullen and terrible pulse of this universe which lies beneath your own. You may even envy the blessedness of the meek, and perceive in the lassitude of the heavy laden a secret grace that can never be yours. Sometimes, by a single sentence, Mr. Gissing will evoke from the most obscure phenomena a large and ominous idea. The time is six o'clock, and the workshops are emptying. He says: "It was the hour of the un-yoking of men." A simple enough phrase, but it lends colour to the aspect of a whole quarter, and fills the soul with a vague, beautiful sense of sympathetic trouble. This is a good example of Mr. Gissing's faculty of poetical constructive observation—a faculty which in his case is at once a strength and a weakness. He sees the world not bit by bit—a series of isolations—but broadly, in vast wholes. He will not confine himself to a unit, whether of the individual or the family. He must have a plurality, working in and out, mutually influencing, as it were seething. So he obtains an elaborate and complicated reflection of the variety and confusion of life impossible to be got in any other way. So also by grouping similar facts he multiplies their significance into something which cannot be ignored. That is his strength. His weakness is that he seems never to be able to centralise the interest. His pictures have no cynosure for the eye. The defect is apparent in all his books, from The Unclassed, a youthful but remarkable work, wherein several separate narratives are connected by a chain of crude coincidences, down to the recently-published Crown of Life, of which the story loses itself periodically in a maze of episodes each interrupting the others. Out of the fine welter of The Nether World nothing emerges paramount. There are a dozen wistful tragedies in this one novel, of which the canvas is as large as that of Anna Karenina—a dozen exquisite and moving renunciations with their accompanying brutalities and horror; but the dark grandeur which ought to have resulted from such an accumulation of effects is weakened by a too impartial diffusion of the author's imaginative power.

I have said that The Nether World is Mr. Gissing's most characteristic book. It is not, however, his best. In Demos, which preceded it by three years (appearing in 1886), the cardinal error of the latter work is avoided. Demos may be esteemed an unqualified success. The canvas is enormous, the characters a multitude, but as the narrative progresses it becomes, instead of a story of socialism as Mr. Gissing intended, the story of one woman. The figure of Adela Mutimer—a girl of race married by the wish of her family to an artisan—monopolises more and more the reader's anxiety, until at length the question of her happiness or misery dwarfs all else. Adela is Mr. Gissing's finest and loveliest creation, and the great scene in which she compels her husband to desist from a crime that could never have been discovered is unmatched in sheer force and conviction by any other in his work. It is, in truth, masterly. Demos has another point of particular interest in that the plot turns chiefly upon the differences which separate class from class. Many novelists have dealt with the consequences of a marriage between persons of unequal birth, but none has brought to the consideration of the matter that wide and exact documentary knowledge of caste and that broad outlook which mark Mr. Gissing's conception. His philosophy seems to be that social distinctions have a profounder influence upon the general human destiny than is commonly thought. The tendency of men of wide sympathies among all grades is to insist on a fundamental similarity underlying the superficial dissimilarity of those grades; but Mr. Gissing by no means accepts the idealistic theory that the rank is but the guinea stamp and a man's a man for a' that. He may almost be said to be obsessed by social distinctions; he is sensitive to the most delicate nuances of them; and it would seem that this man, so free from the slightest trace of snobbishness, would reply, if asked what life had taught him: "The importance of social distinctions." Listen to this about Adela Mutimer and her husband:

He was not of her class, not of her world; only by a violent wrenching of the laws of nature had they come together. She had spent years in trying to convince herself that . . . only an unworthy prejudice parted class from class. One moment of true insight was worth all her theorising on abstract principles. To be her equal this man must be born again . . .

Here is the spirit which informs the whole of Mr. Gissing's work. It crops out again and again in unexpected places. It is always with him. Yet he shows no aristocratic bias whatever: he holds an even balance. If he has a weakness it is for the class "created by the mania of education," consisting "of those unhappy men and women whom unspeakable cruelty endows with intellectual needs while refusing them the sustenance they are taught to crave." The words are the words of the Rev. Mr. Wyvern in Demos, but there are many indications that they express the thoughts of George Gissing. If his heart is hardened, it is against the commercial class, . . . the supremely maleficent. They hold us at their mercy, and their mercy is nought. Monstrously hypocritical, they cry for progress when they mean increased opportunities of swelling their own purses at the expense of those they employ and of those they serve; vulgar to the core, they exalt a gross ideal of well-being, and stink in their prosperity. The very poor and the uncommercial wealthy alike suffer from them; the intellect of the country is poisoned by their influence.

Mr. Gissing has often been called a pessimist: he is not one. He paints in dark tints, for he has looked on the sum of life, and those few who have done this are well aware that life is dark; Clerkenwell is larger than Piccadilly, and Islington than Brixton. The average artist stays at home in life; Mr. Gissing has travelled far, and brought back strange, troublous tales full of disturbing beauty; and he suffers for his originality. The audience is incredulous, and objects to anything which disturbs, even beauty. But Mr. Gissing is not thereby constituted a pessimist; he is merely a man who can gaze without blinking; he is not soured; he has, I fancy, the marvellous belief that happiness is evenly distributed among the human race; he may sup on horrors, but he can digest them without a headache the next morning; he is neither gay nor melancholy, but just sober, calm, and proud against the gods; he has seen, he knows, he is unmoved; he defeats fate by accepting it. When Sidney Kirkwood and Jane Snowden, both beaten and both sad, meet by the grave of Grandfather Snowden, he leaves them thus:

To both was their work given. Unmarked, unencouraged save by their love of uprightness and mercy, they stood by the side of those more hapless, brought some comfort to hearts less courageous than their own. Where they abode it was not all dark. Sorrow certainly awaited them, perchance defeat in even the humble aims that they had set themselves; but at least their lives would remain a protest against those brute forces of society which fill with wreck the abysses of the nether world.

This may be grievous, but it is not pessimism. The thoughtless may say that it is scarcely diverting to read after dinner; but those who can bear to reflect upon the large issues of life will be grateful that an artist of Mr. Gissing's calibre has used his art so finely for the inculcation of fortitude and serenity.

"Children of the Ghetto."

MR. ISRAEL ZANGWILL'S "Children of the Ghetto," admirably acted by an American company at the Adelphi Theatre, is a drama aggressively Jewish in tone. The aloofness of the Jews from ordinary humanity is insisted on throughout, and much of the play is occupied in exhibiting and explaining those strange customs which still prevail among the Hebrew race. Mr. Zangwill is proud of being a Jew. It is right that he should be so, but nevertheless it would seem that he has laid too great a stress upon the superficial peculiarities of his kindred, while passing over those deep and essential characteristics which really constitute them a people apart and withdrawn from the world. The picture that he paints of the Whitechapel Ghetto in 1867 is full of quaintness and surprise, full of poetry, too, and of human nature. But the quaintness and surprise, which should have been the least prominent features, Mr. Zangwill has made the chief. It is doubtless rather odd that in the Ghetto if a man jokingly puts a ring on a girl's finger, and pronounces certain words before two witnesses, the pair should be thereby married in the eyes of the Church. But to select such an improbable triviality for the foundation of a serious tragedy is a fault in art. Even in the Ghetto the incident could not recur more than once in a generation. And this is not the whole of Mr. Zangwill's guilt. He deliberately chooses a second oddity—that a man of the Cohens (tribe of Aaron) may not wed a divorced woman—and, imposing it on the other one, manufactures his catastrophe. If the first incident is improbable, its conjuncture with the second matter makes an improbability beyond the dream of mathematics. Is the stuff of tragedy so rare in the Ghetto that it must be concocted out of themes so far fetched? Are not the Jews men and women even as the Gentiles are, subject to the same simplicities of passion and fate? If so, why has Mr. Zangwill preferred material so bizarre and intractable as is here displayed?

It is such questions that one asks during Acts I. and II. and part of Act III. of "Children of the Ghetto." After the groundwork is at length tardily constructed, and the way cleared for the tragedy itself, then the play becomes a new thing. The conflict between love and piety in the breast of Hannah Jacobs, the Rabbi's daughter, is set forth in the most moving and poignant terms. The alternate scenes with her father, representing religion, and with her lover, representing passion, are not only dramatic to a degree, but at once essentially poetic and instinct with fidelity to life. The end of the last act, with all the ingeniously contrived mechanism of the Passover ritual, is masterly. One forgets that this beautiful structure is reared on a foundation which can only be called ridiculous. One forgets everything except the fact that here is dramatic poetry, simple and profound. Mr. Zangwill proves himself, indeed, a dramatist of distinction. Not often is modern work of such quality seen on the London stage, or on any other stage. The pity is that it should be marred by what precedes it. In the first two acts Mr. Zangwill has obviously essayed to render the picturesque composite life of the Ghetto. He has, perhaps, done so, but he has not done so dramatically; and in the doing he came near to ruining the whole piece. The main theme is swamped in a sea of marvellous but arid and inapposite cleverness and ingenuity—exactly such as spoilt Mr. Zangwill's best novel. It does not, in truth, emerge at all until the second act. The first act is complete within itself, and till the curtain rises again no one could possibly guess what the trend of the story was to be. Let us add that in Melchisedek Pinchas, the Hebrew poet, a personage unconnected with the main theme, Mr. Zangwill has created a masterpiece of humour and wild imagination, and that Mr. William Norris played the part magnificently.

"Like Another Helen."

I WAS very glad to see in the ACADEMY of December 9, under the heading "Favourite Books of '99," that one writer mentioned Like Another Helen, by Mr., Mrs., or Miss (I do not know which) Sydney C. Grier. It seems to me that this delightful and accomplished work has by no means received the attention it deserves. Possibly its very virtues of delicacy and fidelity to the fastidious taste of a lady of the eighteenth century are in themselves a stumbling-block to popularity with a hasty and sensation-loving public. But this story is none the less a charming piece of work. The action of an extremely interesting and well-contrived plot takes place in India, in the days of Clive, but there is no trace of the meretricious convention of the average historical novel; it reads like a contemporary document. There is a wealth of information, never obstructed, but woven with surprising dexterity into the fabric of the story, an intimate acquaintance with the affairs of Anglo-Indian society of the day, a vivacious and life-like reflexion of the manners and diction of a punctilious age; and, above all, there is an enchanting heroine who reveals her personality, with a grace as touching as it is artless, through the medium of the quaintly-worded letters in which the author, faithful even in that particular to his period, has told the eventful story of Sylvia Freyne. I should like to recommend this book to all who have a taste for the manner as well as the matter of their reading. In Like Another Helen they will find both.

Diarist and Novelist.

HAPPENING to read portions of Sir Algernon West's Recollections (1832 to 1886) and Charles Dickens's Bleak House in the same day, I was amused by the following parallelism which instantly suggested itself. It may be worth setting forth, as showing how a novelist may dispense with "a huge despatch-box full of correspondence in connexion with the formation of a Government."

From Sir Algernon West's "Recollections."

In a few minutes Mr. Gladstone had put into my hands a huge despatch-box full of correspondence in connexion with the formation of his Government. It was then that I understood why Sir Robert Peel described it as the hardest task that could fall to a Minister.

The modesty of a few and the pretensions of many—who reminded me of the Persian proverb. "They came to shoe the Pasha's horses, and the beetle stretched out his leg"—the overweening self-hness of some, and the qualifications and aspirations of those eager for office, and a particular office; the vested-interest claim, which held that a man once included in a Government should ever after have a right to a higher office in each succeeding Administration—all this lay open before me.

How few of these aspirants but are beyond their hopes and their disappointments now!

*From Charles Dickens's
"Bleak House."*

My Lord Boodle perceives with astonishment, that supposing the present Government to be overthrown, the limited choice of the Crown, in the formation of a new Ministry, would lie between Lord Coodle and Sir Thomas Doodle—supposing it to be impossible for the Duke of Foodle to act with Goodle, which may be assumed to be the case in consequence of the breach arising out of that affair with Hoodle. Then, giving the Home Department and the Leadership of the House of Commons to Joodle, the Exchequer to Koodle, the Colonies to Loodle, and the Foreign Office to Moodle, what are you to do with Noodle? You can't offer him the Presidency of the Council; that is reserved for Poodle. You can't put him in the Woods and Forests; that is hardly good enough for Quoodle. What follows? That the country is shipwrecked . . . because you can't provide for Noodle!

Memoirs of the Moment.

SIR ROBERT PEEL does not intend to sell, nor has the Court authorised him to sell, the heirloom pictures that have the most sentimental and historical interest. Nor are any family portraits to be sold. Perhaps this decision does not wholly satisfy the feelings of Lord Peel (whose interest, however, is only a contingent one), for a decidedly sentimental value does attach even to the Dutch pictures about to go under the hammer, inasmuch as the great First Policeman loved each one of them with a particular and discriminating love. They adorned the room he most continuously occupied in Whitehall-gardens; and, later, at Drayton Manor they were serious rivals of Nature herself in his affections. Still, even of the Dutch pictures he chose with so much intelligence many have been long estranged from his family. The National Gallery is the lucky possessor of some of the greatest gems. There is the "Chapeau de Paille," as that portrait of the lady of the Lunden family is called whom Rubens painted, and with whom he fell in love. Rubens would not part with the picture—he had sentimental reasons enough why that should not be sold. After his death it was acquired for £1,500, was re-sold in Antwerp in 1817 for £3,000, and was bought by Sir Robert for £3,500, in 1843, the highest price ever paid till then for a half-length portrait.

BURLINGTON HOUSE banquets are popularly supposed to make friends for the Royal Academy among Ministers of State. That may or may not be; but it is certain that had Royalty carried out its ideas about this Royal institution, its affairs would be differently arranged. In 1830 George IV. did seriously meditate a Royal Academy reform; and it was Sir Robert Peel who put the project aside. There was a vacancy in the presidentship, and the King, no doubt, wanted Wilkie, whereas the Academy elected Shee. The King thereupon appointed Wilkie his Painter in Ordinary; and Sir Robert's tact, not to say flattery, accomplished the rest. "I told the King," he writes to Lord Farnborough, "that we thought his Majesty stood so well with the artists of this country, that he was so universally admitted to be the greatest patron Art ever had in England, that it would not be prudent to risk the excitement of any other feelings. The King at once assented, and said: 'Well, perhaps we had better not meddle with the Royal Academy.' He was particularly good-humoured," Sir Robert adds. And well might he be after his promotion to be art-patron-in-chief of his kingdom."

It was just a little unlucky that General Gatacre should have to wire, after the disaster near Molteno: "I am holding Cypher Gat." Perhaps it was his own grim joke, smarting under misfortune; for his schoolfellows knew him only as "Gat."

THE death of Lord Penzance, at the age of eighty-three, follows rather quickly on his retirement, last March, from the post of judge under the Public Worship Act. Perhaps the appointment was not a very suitable one; except for the fact that he was a retired judge, drawing a large pension, who was willing to put his hand to the work created by that discord-making piece of legislation. Lord Beaconsfield and Sir William Harcourt were at one in its support; Mr. Gladstone and Lord Salisbury became brothers in opposition, though in the House of Lords the then Archbishop of Canterbury had charge of the Bill. Lord Penzance, as the new legal assessor, was pretty openly derided by High Churchmen, and in one or two cases his decisions were set at naught. The suits heard before him grew fewer and farther between; and there was a certain pathos about the position of a man who, in his own time, had seen come over the religious world a transformation to which he himself could never become accustomed. A nephew of Lord Chancellor Truro, he had Anglican traditions; but by an unlucky freak of nature he had in many ways the bearing and appearance of a Jewish rabbi; and that was an added bitterness to men like Lord Halifax, by whom his decisions were scouted. They might, however, have taken this consolation into consideration, that if they had not had Lord Penzance set over them as a ruler in Israel they would probably have had Lord Grimthorpe.

THE Marquis of Bute, though he has been brought to London, does not make any appearance in public; nor is his condition sufficiently improved to allow him to attend to public affairs, or even to his own business concerns. Lady Bute is the constant and devoted attendant on her husband.

THE death is announced of Lady Berkeley, who, besides inheriting the barony of Berkeley, which was separate from the earldom, was also co-heiress of the Barony of Braose of Gower, and claimed besides to be heir-general to the Earldom of Ormond through her descent from the first Earl, Thomas Boleyn, the father of Anne Boleyn. She was the niece of that amusing writer—and a writer who was most amusing at the expense of his own relatives—Mr. Grantley Berkeley; and there are privately printed pamphlets concerning family disputes that can be read now as ancient history, and therefore without the personal pain or the invidious partisanship that was engendered by an acquaintance with them forty years ago.

THE Lord Chief Justice, who was present at the pleasant evening party given by Lady Russell of Killowen to the members of the Irish Literary Society, made at the Royal Societies' Club on Monday night a speech that was all in favour of peace. The result has been, by the cross-purposes of life, all sorts of little contretemps. The Times, reproved in an extra-judicial utterance, of "gross impertinence" for lecturing the Paris arbitrators on the length of their deliberations, has the aplomb to respond by a gentle hint that the lecture really did shorten the proceedings. That is quite absurd, of course; but there has been little love shown by "the leading organ, I think it is called," and the Lord Chief Justice since the days when, as Sir Charles Russell, he led against it before the Parnell Commission. Then the reporters, too, who made the Lord Chief Justice speak on the decay of Spain in association with its profession of the Roman Catholic religion, have, of course, added to the confusion; and a disclaimer has gone forth from the usually imperturbable chief Bench of the Law Courts. Finally, the allusion of the orator of the evening to the contrast between the home-coming of arbitration commissioners and that of the fighters by the sword has not given pleasure in all quarters; but it will, for all that, be remembered when the war fever is over. Meanwhile, the Lord Chief Justice must be able to reflect on the mutability of public opinion; for it is only about a couple of years since his arbitration address in America was cabled over verbatim to the English press, and commented upon with a unanimity of agreement rarely to be found among the leader-writers on any single morning.

Correspondence.

"Prince Otto."

SIR,—It may interest your correspondent "C." to know that Mr. Andrew Lang has somewhere—though exactly where I am unable to recall; is it in Essays in Little?—forestalled Mr. Cornford in his dictum of Prince Otto. I cannot remember Mr. Lang's words, but, in substance, he says he finds it impossible to read the tale without a wavering suspicion that the author is all the time playing with the reader.

Now "C." maintains that Mr. Cornford's admission of disappointment is a clear proof that he does not care for Prince Otto. This is, surely, to draw a rather too summary conclusion. I humbly claim to be among the most enthusiastic and genuine of Stevenson's disciples. I love the man as revealed in his books and letters, as much as I admire and strive to follow the doctrines that he teaches. Yet I must confess to having experienced a feeling with regard to Prince Otto very akin to that of Mr. Lang's.

I have read the book the three times that "C." advocates, and am still unable to rid myself of the unpleasant and disturbing belief that Stevenson is not quite in earnest. I am aware that this will likely be regarded as a most heretical opinion. To me, however, the tale reads as an experiment. It is not fully matured. Mind, I do not mean to imply that it is not honest or sincere.

Stevenson could not have written a book, he could not have written a page, a paragraph—nay, he could not have written a single sentence that was not both of these; but I cannot bring myself to believe that Stevenson intended the book to be taken quite so seriously as has been its fate. Beautiful it is, and many of the descriptive passages must live in a man's mind for generations to come; nevertheless, reviewing the book from all points, I must admit to liking it the least of Stevenson's works.

This does not necessarily mean that I do not care for the book. On the contrary, I do care for it; but not quite as I care for everything else that has come from the same heroic pen.

I have read Mr. Cornford's warmly written chapters. His admission of a disappointment is surely no proof of his indifference. I am not here to champion Mr. Cornford, however. I merely desire to show that "C.'s" inference is unjust; that there are others who hold as Mr. Cornford does; and that it is still possible to care for and enjoy a book though you may be somewhat disappointed with it as a whole.—I am, &c., ### Lark and Rocket.

SIR,—Notwithstanding the distinct charm of the three little pieces quoted in the ACADEMY of November 25 from Mr. Henley's Songs and Madrigals, there is a note in the second piece that jars:

And over the faded lea
The skylark scatters his rocketing song.

It puzzles one's head, this notion of "scattering a rocketing song": one does not quite see what it means; and yet the words have a familiar sound. I could not make it out at first, but light broke at last. In a delightful little poem by Mr. Herbert E. Clarke, published with "Tannhäuser" in 1896, and called "A March Medley," there is the same combination of words in an intelligible form:

A lark goes up like a rocket,
And scatters his song in air.

I never saw one of all the thousands of larks I have watched that really went up like a rocket; but "scatters his song in air" has great rectitude. So have Mr. Clarke's subsequent words:

But Shelley did him very well,
And I may therefore spare my breath.

But "scatters his rocketing song" can scarcely claim to be an improvement on "goes up like a rocket, and scatters his song in air." It seems to me that the transfer of the rocket notion from the bird to the song just spoils the whole thing. If there is little of the rocket in the bird, still less is there in his song, thank goodness!—I am, &c.,

Wanted—Novels of Observation.

SIR,—Your correspondents who point out the adaptability for fictional treatment of life in the shop do not appear to know of two comparatively recent novels dealing with this subject—one, A Guardian of the Poor, by T. Baron Russell (John Lane); the other, Moonlight, by Mary E. Mann (Fisher Unwin). The first-named deals fully with life in a draper's shop in South London. Mrs. Mann's book is concerned with life in the drapery trade in the provinces.—I am, &c.,

"Criticism by Semaphore."

IN the course of a letter too long to print, Mr. William Smithard writes from Derby: "Your reviewer has seen, and very effectively held up to ridicule, the two most prominent faults in Mr. Baker's Guide to Fiction—i.e., the abbreviations, and the bias in some of the criticisms. . . . Mr. Baker [the author] has met with the difficulties of a pioneer, but I submit that he has taken a good step forward, and should therefore be praised for what he has done, and encouraged to do still better things."

Our Weekly Competitions.

Result of No. 12 (New Series).

IN the preceding column will be found the terms of a special ACADEMY competition which was foreshadowed in our last number. We then asked our ordinary Prize Competitors to try their hands at devising six subjects suitable for this competition. There can be no doubt whatever that the best and most thoughtful list is that composed by Mr. A. Griffith, Fair View, Wells-road, Malvern:—

SIX LITERARY EXERCISES.

1. An ode, "France in 1899."
  2. An oration to be read at the unveiling of an Imperial memorial in London, erected in memory of the soldiers who may fall in the Transvaal War. (The inscription on the monument may be quoted.)
  3. A prologue to be declaimed or acted at the opening of the first national or municipal theatre in England. (Conventional form of prologue need not be adopted.)
  4. An essay on "the pathetic fallacy." (See "Modern Painters.")
  5. A description of a Salvation Army meeting.
  6. An account of the discovery of the statue of the Olympian Zeus at Shasoa by an English artist in the year 1901.
- (I am afraid a large volume, much less 2,000 words, would be a meagre allowance for the description of this momentous event. The writer could choose any aspect of the subject. The previous or subsequent adventures of either explorer or statue, chryselephantine sculpture, a description of the Hellenistic priests, their mysteries and sacred books. The description would take the form of a letter to the writer's friend in the museum as writer; statue and MSS. would, probably, perish in a typhoon in the Indian Ocean.)

Among other lists are these:—

1. A sermon on a fixed text.
2. A short story.
3. A poem.
4. An essay on a fixed subject.
5. A translation from the French.
6. A political leading article.

[A. T. de M., London.]

Suggestion the first—a brisk autobiography,
Carelessly candied, unstudied in style;
Next, an essay on travel, devoid of geography,
England, if possible—not on the Nile;
Then, a study of any acknowledged authority,
Lamb, if you will, or, it may be, Carlyle;
Next, a story—your first, or, of less seniority,
The best you have done for a deuce of a while;
Then, a "leader," concise, conclusive, conventional,
Wherein you reveal, but, oh, never revile;
Last, a copy of verses whose charms unintentional
(Inspired, shall we say?) show no trace of the file.

[J. D. A., Ealing.]

1. A short story.
2. A critical note on a modern writer.
3. A biographical note on a recently deceased writer.
4. Ultra-realism in literature.
5. The present lack of great poetry.
6. The effect of the spread of education on the literary output.

[A. H. W., Westward Ho!]

1. An essay estimating the position in history or literature of some man or woman not now living.
2. Review some British work of fiction published within the last five years, showing in what ways it follows the general trend of present-day thought, and to what extent it is original in subject, treatment, and style.
3. Translate from some foreign language—Latin and Greek not excluded—either a continuous passage or passages selected as being representative of the author, or as illustrating his treatment of a particular subject. Prose must be translated by prose, and verse by verse.
4. Write a cycle of short poems, none of which must exceed 500 words. They must be connected by one leading idea, and must all be necessary to its development.
5. Write a play in one act, not necessarily suitable for the stage. The working-out of a plot need not be attempted, but the play must centre round some problem, which must be solved in developing the characters. It may be written in prose or verse.
6. Write a scheme of an original work in history, biography or fiction, making clear its scope and plan, and showing the division into volumes, parts, or chapters.

[E. F. S., Clifton.]

1. Which books should this year have been "crowned" had the ACADEMY awards been made on the former basis? State your reasons for your decision.
2. Select from among living authors the half-dozen whose fame will be the greatest fifty years hence, and justify the selection.
3. Who is the greatest prose writer of the nineteenth century?

4. What department in literature affords the greatest scope to writers seeking to fill unoccupied positions, and to make original contributions to literature?

5. Name the two new writers of the past year who give the greatest promise, and substantiate your choice.

6. On whom should the Poet Laureateship be bestowed on the happening of the next vacancy?

[B. R., London.]

Lists received also from:—G. E. M., London; C. L., London; W. C. F., Dumbreck; B. M. R., London; Miss J. W., Stroud; B. R. B., Great Malvern; A. E., Oxford; G. M. B., Leeds; G. H., Didsbury; E. ### Competition No. 13 (New Series).

We have received from a well-known novelist the following letter:

"I wish to put together a shelf-full of books for a debating club in a very small country town. We are ardent politicians, but our information unfortunately falls more than a little short of our zeal. We have (say) £2 to begin upon. It might amuse some of your readers to help us by suggesting lists, and I can assure you we should be glad of their help. The question is, What can we do for £2 (allowing for discount)? The cost of carriage may be ignored, although we have no local bookseller: for Sir Roger de Coverley, our President, is starting on a visit to town and has offered to bring the books home in his portmanteau."

We offer a prize of a guinea for the best list of books suitable for the purpose named procurable for £2.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, December 20. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the third column of p. 732 or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers.

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

THE LIFE OF EDWARD WHITE BENSON. BY ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER BENSON.

Two volumes (1,400 pages) replete with every kind of biographical matter. We have letters which the Archbishop wrote to his mother at twelve, and letters which he wrote to bishops and scholars in the prime of life. The pictures show us Dr. Benson on his horse and in his study, &c. We have long extracts from a "safety-valve" diary which he kept in later life. The domestic, the professional, and the spiritual man are here. (Macmillan.)

TENNYSON, RUSKIN, MILL, AND OTHER LITERARY ESTIMATES. BY FREDERIC HARRISON.

"A SERIES of systematic estimates of some leading influences on the thought of our time." Thus Mr. Harrison describes these papers on Tennyson, Ruskin, Arnold, J. A. Symonds, Gibbon, John Stuart Mill, and others. Mr. Ruskin is treated both as a prophet and as a master of prose. A book of solid judgments, delivered with the writer's ripe conviction. (Macmillan. 8s. 6d. net.)

UNWRITTEN LAWS AND IDEALS OF ACTIVE CAREERS. EDITED BY E. H. PITCAIRN.

How people of consequence regulate their official and social conduct: this is the interesting subject on which Miss Pitcairn has collected information. The ideal behaviour of ambassadors to callers; the why and when of a Judge's robes; the conditions of popularity in a Headmaster; the relations between composers and musicians—these are the kind of points elucidated. In all, eighteen professions are carefully overhauled, and each by an expert in his profession. The following is quoted as the ideal speech to British soldiers before battle: "The General says that Dargai must be taken: the Gordon Highlanders will take it." The reasons for this are set forth. (Smith, Elder & Co. 6s.)

EVANGELICAL BELIEF. BY JOHN BROADHURST NICHOLS.

TOWARDS the close of 1898 the Committee of the Religious Tract Society offered a prize of One Hundred Pounds for the best essay on "Evangelical Belief." The object of the Committee was to evoke an able criticism of the sacerdotal tendencies of the day. This is the essay that pleased them best. One condition was that the discussion must be "without controversial bitterness"; hence there has been no rivalry in the art of abuse. (Religious Tract Society. 6s.)

GEORGE SELWYN; HIS LETTERS AND HIS LIFE. EDITED BY E. S. ROSCOE AND HELEN CLERGUE.

THIS book will supplement the general knowledge of this eighteenth century wit and table-talker. Few of his letters were known until, in the Fifteenth Report of the Historical Manuscript Commission, there were printed more than two hundred letters from his pen which had been preserved at Castle Howard. A selection of these interesting letters, which are full of matter, is printed, with careful annotations, in this volume. Society and politics, the American War of Independence, the fall of Lord North Fox's debts and Pitt's first speech, the Royal Society, and Almack's: these dominate the correspondence. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

BY MOOR AND FELL. BY HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE.

TOPOGRAPHY is attracting better pens, and is receiving more artistic treatment, every year. In his novel Ricraft of Withens Mr. Sutcliffe gave us admirable backgrounds of the wild moors and fells of Yorkshire. He now describes these lands of peat and heather and lonely manors in detail. Students of the Brontë novels will value the first chapter, which is on Haworth. (Unwin. 6s.)

BISMARCK. BY JAMES W. HEADLAM.

THE "Heroes of the Nations" series has made great progress: this is the twenty-ninth volume. Mr. Headlam says that the greater number of his pages were completed before the death of Prince Bismarck; but he has used all the later material that has been published, notably the collections of Horst Kohl, and Herr von Poschinger. Mr. Headlam incidentally remarks: "A good collection of Bismarck's correspondence is much wanted." (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 5s.)

AMERICAN LANDS AND LETTERS. BY D. G. MITCHELL.

A TYPE of book in which America excels is the book of tender reminiscences, illustrated with real care and intelligence. This is such a book. It starts "with times when the wealthy independence of General Jackson made itself heard in Congressional corridors, and when young ears were listening eagerly for new footfalls of the brave 'Leather Stocking' in the paths of American woods; and it closes with the lugubrious and memorable notes of the 'Raven' of Poe." (Dent & Co. 7s. 6d.)

LIFE OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE (LIBRARY EDITION). BY SIDNEY LEE.

THE evolution of this book is interesting. First it was a dictionary article; next it was a modest octavo volume; now it is too tall for most shelves, and a very beautiful book. The numerous illustrations which the present edition contains are not mere embellishments, but may be regarded as graphic additions to the substance of the work. Nevertheless, the purely artistic value of many of them is great. The text has also received additions: the remarks on Shakespeare's autographs and handwriting are extended, and Mr. Lee has inserted a description of the interesting copy of the First Folio in Mr. Sibthorp's library which very recently came to light. Other extensions might be noted, but in no case do the alterations modify the general conclusions to which Mr. Lee has already given expression. The book as a whole is superbly produced. The design on the cover is taken from a rare binding of English workmanship of the sixteenth century, now in the British Museum. (Smith, Elder & Co. 16s.)

THE PRAISE OF GARDENS. BY ALBERT FORBES SIVEKING.

A NEW edition of a collection which Walter Pater called "a scholarly little book." That was fourteen years ago. Here the author has tried by addition and omission to hit more nearly the mark he had in view—viz., "to bring together a series of prose passages giving an historical survey" of garden books. All garden writers are quoted, from Solomon to Bacou, and from Addison to d'Annunzio. The illustrations to this edition are numerous and admirably chosen; and the book breathes of gardens. (Dent & Co. 7s. 6d.)

THE CONQUEST OF ENGLAND. BY JOHN RICHARD GREEN.

ONE is always glad to see a standard work included in the handy and comely "Eversley" series. This book, of which the first edition appeared in 1883, is now added to the eleven volumes by Green which have already reached this goal. (Macmillan. 2 vols. 10s.)

FREDERICK WARNE & CO.'S SELECTED LIST.

A NEW NOVEL BY FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT.

Now ready at all Libraries and Booksellers.

IN CONNECTION WITH THE DE WILLOUGHBY CLAIM.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

PRESS OPINIONS:

The DE WILLOUGHBY CLAIM

The DAILY TELEGRAPH, Nov. 29, 1889.

"... We have no hesitation in saying that Mrs. Burnett's new work is one of the most moving novels of the year... and it contains scenes of a most tender and pervading sweetness. As is always the case in Mrs. Hodgson Burnett's best work, it is the loveliness of her characters which gives such charm to her pages. To pass from scenes of keen pathos to others of such tender charm, from the pitiful figure of Margery to that of the radiant Sheba, is an employment which, however affecting to our emotions, is very fascinating. It is an exceedingly attractive novel."

The DE WILLOUGHBY CLAIM

The WEEKLY SUN, Dec. 2, 1889.

"... 'The De Willoughby Claim' shows the gifted authoress at her best. The novel is one of the most human that has been published this year, and is full of that sweetness and pathos we have come to look for in Mrs. Hodgson Burnett's work. The characters are all lovable. It is the biggest thing Mrs. Hodgson Burnett has attempted, and she has been rewarded with conspicuous success."

The DE WILLOUGHBY CLAIM

The DAILY CHRONICLE, Dec. 8, 1889.

"Mrs. Burnett has never written better than in this story. She has never delineated character more delicately, more sympathetically, her pathos has never been truer, her humour more engaging. The book gives one the impression of having been written with great and worthy care. No writer, not the very ablest, who made a point of turning out, say, three novels a year, could possibly have done anything so good as 'The De Willoughby Claim.'"

RECENT FICTION.

IMPORTANT WORK BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUENN."

VRONI: the Weaver's Heart's

Dearest. By BLANCHE WILLIS HOWARD.
Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, 6s.

"'Vroni,' a quaint unsophisticated child of nature, is an original and engaging personality, and the author has depicted her with exceptional power. There are many moving incidents in the tale, which is written in a pretty and often poetic style which is singularly attractive, and the interest is well maintained to the end."—Publisher's Circular.

THE STRANGE ADVENTURES OF ISRAEL PENDRAY. By SILAS K. HOCKING.

Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"'The Strange Adventures of Israel Pendray' tells a tale of Cornish life a century ago. With such a theme and such material Mr. Hocking has sketched in graphic and bold outline, with occasional detail, character studies of the greatest interest. The tale never flags, and the interest at times is intensely dramatic. We consider the latest of Mr. Silas K. Hocking's books will be classed as one of his most successful efforts."—Sheffield Independent.

THE IMPERIAL POETS.

Bound in elegant style in art linen, inlaid vellum panel, gilt lettered, gilt edges, with 6 Photographs, per vol., 8s. 6d.

The distinctive feature of the Imperial Poets over other series published is the six photographs which appear in each volume, the finest paper only is used, and ten out of the twelve volumes of the series have a red line border. A Portrait of the Poet is given in all cases, and the photographs illustrate the actual scenes alluded to in the text of the poem, or have some direct interest in connection with the life of the Poet.

The Literary Week.

MR. CONAN DOYLE's decision to volunteer for service in South Africa and to find his own charger is spirited and admirable. Not many literary men have the physique or means to make similar offers. We wish they had. But physique and means are not all that Mr. Doyle may be asked to provide. The Cape authorities are understood to desire the services of first-class detectives capable of unmasking Boer spies. Probably in their wildest dreams they never hoped for so distinguished an ally as Sherlock Holmes. Whether as a specialist in detection or as a man of might in action, Mr. Conan Doyle is equally a welcome recruit. And when all is over his pen will doubtless help us the better to realise what the sword has been accomplishing. It must also be remembered that Mr. Doyle's spheres of usefulness do not end with fighting and detection. He is also a very capable surgeon.

THE latest enterprise of Mr. Harmsworth is the projection of the soldiers' Evening News. This is to be an edition of the Evening News consisting entirely of war news for the consumption primarily of the British soldier who is engaged in making that news; and it has been decided upon because of the soldier's anxiety to know "what they are saying about him and his deeds in the old country." Personally, we feel that the soldier is better without such information. His duty is to fight, and not to read Fleet-street criticisms on his fighting. But this is a reading age, when everything is published, and Tommy Atkins having as much right to share the fashion as anyone else, we cannot urge our opinion very far. The Under-Secretary for War has, it seems, expressed his cordial approval of the scheme, and Messrs. Donald Currie & Co. are prepared to convey the papers to the Cape free of charge.

MANY of the private letters describing battles and incidents in the war have been excellent. A judicious selection would make a most interesting volume. It might well be published in monthly parts, beginning at once. A multitude of books on the campaign by professional correspondents are being arranged for. We hear of several applications to editors of daily papers for the names of the writers of special correspondence.

WE have received notification of the following changes in the S. S. McClure Co., of New York. By a friendly arrangement the present partnership between Mr. S. S. McClure and Mr. F. N. Doubleday, constituting the Doubleday & McClure Co., will be dissolved. Mr. Doubleday will continue business on his own account. Mr. McClure, in addition to conducting his own magazine (McClure's), will establish a new illustrated Review, and will publish an Encyclopædia and other books. Mr. Robert McClure, in London, will hereafter represent only the S. S. McClure Co. and its interests.

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD sends us the following instance of rapid printing. The third edition of Red Pottage was burnt while at press on the morning of Saturday, December 9, and the plates hopelessly damaged. Within three hours of the news being received sixteen compositors were at work at Guildford, re-setting the type, and by Wednesday night the whole book had been reprinted and an edition of three thousand copies machined. Thirty-six hours were occupied in binding, and the third edition was on sale at ten o'clock on Friday morning, December 15.

THE question "Have you read Red Pottage?" now has, by the way, a companion. People interested in the patriotic recitation at the Empire ask: "Have you heard Brown Pottage?"

A FORTUNATE misstatement in the Periodical, the excellent advertising magazine of the Clarendon Press, has drawn from Mr. Birrell the following letter of remonstrance:

SIR,—I was petrified with horror to find myself pilloried in the Periodical as a man capable of sneering at the Clarendon Press. I would as soon think of poking fun at the Parthenon.

How it was possible for the writer in the Spectator so to misread the passage quoted from my Lectures on Copyright would puzzle me more than it does had I not been a reviewer myself. His pipe probably went out just at the moment, and, after he had refilled and relit it, he lost the thread of my discourse.

What I had in my mind was not the supineness of the Clarendon Press, but the worthlessness of most copyrights after the death of the authors of the books. Supposing Mr. Tupper had bequeathed his Proverbial Philosophy to the Clarendon Press, how many editions of it would have appeared after Mr. Tupper's death? It is disheartening to be so easily misunderstood.

Two new illustrated sixpenny weeklies will make their appearance next month—the Sphere, Mr. Shorter's new paper, and the King, which will be issued by Sir George Newnes. Mr. James Walter Smith will edit the King. Mr. Smith for long has been the editor of the American edition of the Strand Magazine.

MR. JOHN LATEY, the editor of the Sketch, sends us the following reply to our question as to what two books had most pleased and interested him in 1899: "Fights for the Flag and the first volume of How England Saved Europe, by the Rev. W. H. Fitchett, for, at a critical period of our history this most picturesque battle-limner has seasonably stimulated the patriotism of Britons by reminding us of the valorous Deeds that Won the Empire."

MR. A. B. WALKLEY, whose first series of articles under the title Frames of Mind has lately been published in book form, is contributing a second series to the Morning Leader.

FROM the Chronicle's "Wills and Bequests" column of Tuesday last:

Charles Grant Blairfindie Allen, author, died October 25, 1899, aged fifty-one; £6,455 gross, £3,500 net personalty.

Francis Hudson, cheesemonger, died October 26, 1899, aged sixty-three; £275,810 gross, £190,086 net personalty.

EVERY year Mr. A. P. Watt, the Literary Agent, puts forth blushing a little book of testimonials to his wisdom and operativeness from the principal authors for whom he labours. Year by year the book grows in size, since new clients are continually seeking Mr. Watt's assistance. This year, among the new and satisfied clients, we find Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler, Mr. Maurice Hewlett, Mr. Whiteing, Mr. Bullen, Mr. Walter Raymond and Mr. Bernard Capes. All write enthusiastically of their dealings with their agent, and most of them playfully take pains with their letters. Mr. Capes is, as is usual with him, stylish. He writes:

I can only say that if your faith in me shall prove to be as well justified as is mine in you, there will be one contented author, at least, by-and-by in England. And in the meantime I exist in the perfect confidence that to this condition of mind I am destined—and through you. You have already, indeed, given me ample proof that man without an agent is a self-stultifying beast; and I am now of infinitely greater value (ratably) in my own eyes than I was before the beginning of my fortunate connexion with you. Pray keep me in conceit with myself by remaining mine faithfully,

As I am always yours faithfully, &c.

This, surely, is literature! Mr. Bullen has his little metaphor all pat:

I should say that you are not merely a luxury to a literary man, you are a necessity—a pilot to the voyager in unknown waters and an epitome of practical knowledge that acts as well as advises.

Mr. Hewlett is sententious and complimentary:

It is a great thing to have one's business smoothly done, and to find sympathy with one's hopes and aims. I quite realise also that your position between the Author and the Deep Sea is one of delicacy; but your tact has shown you the channel. I am sure you have no more to fear from prejudice.

But the cream of the new matter is the "characteristic" letter of the witty author of A Double Thread. This is an advertisement worth striving after; humour, sprightliness, allusion—all are here:

In the first place, you seem to be a sort of literary hazel-twig, possessing the magic quality of discovering Pactolian streams in most unlikely and unlooked-for spots. And, in the second, I find it a vast relief to push the burden of all my business arrangements on to your most efficient shoulders. One woman cannot be "like Cerberus, three gentlemen at once"—that is to say, an author, a good business-man, and a man about town: yet these I tried to be before I met you; but now I cheerfully devote myself to my tongue and my pen, and leave you to look after my pocket; with every confidence that—while I am enjoying myself—my pocket will give me full satisfaction, owing to your help.

I agree with the Irishman who said, "I don't care whether I live or die as long as I keep my health"; and I am convinced that every author who endorses this sentiment will do well to place his or her business arrangements in your hands, and so be saved no end of anxiety and trouble.

After this Mr. Whiteing's sober testimony is almost unreadable in its straightforwardness; but Mr. Watt should like it as well as any:

And it is something to be represented in the market by one who is no higgler, but who has a due sense of the buyer's position as well as of the seller's claims.

By a prophetic chance Macaulay gave Mr. Watt one of the best "notices" he has had. In the Essay on Madame D'Arblay he speaks of the old king, George the Third, trotting into the room with "'What! what! what! in his mouth.'" Mr. Watt should adopt this royal advertisement as his motto.

THE following is the list of contents of the handsome volume of Choral Songs by Various Writers and Composers in Honour of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, which Messrs. Macmillan have just published:

	AUTHOR	COMPOSER
With wisdom, goodness, grace	Alfred Austin	Sir A. C. Mackenzie
Out on the windy West	Arthur C. Benson	C. V. Stanford
Hark! the world is full of thy praise	Robert Bridges	H. Walford Davies
For all the wonder of thy regal day	Earl of Crewe	Sir Frederick Bridge
The seaboard are her mantle's hem	John Davidson	Sir George Martin
Who can dwell with greatness!	Austin Dobson	Sir Hubert Parry
Lady on the silver throne	Edmund Gosse	A. M. Goodhart
A Century's Penultimate	Arthur C. James	Charles Wood
With still increasing blessings	Marquis of Lorne	Arthur Somervell
To her beneath whose steadfast star	Frederic W. H. Myers	Edward Elgar
A thousand years, by sea and land	Henry Newbolt	C. H. Lloyd
Flora's Queen	J. F. R. Stainer	Sir John Stainer
The Triumph of Victoria	T. H. Warren	Sir Walter Parratt

THIS sumptuous quarto of Choral Songs contains, it must be admitted, some very indifferent poetry. Writing for music is, of course, a shackling business; but there is no reason that we know of why it should lead to such loose rhyming as two at least of these poets indulge in. Mr. Gilbert, we may remind them, who has done more writing for music than probably any other living man, has never rhymed loosely. But look at this couplet from Mr. A. C. Benson's madrigal:

What merry breezes would not crack their cheeks to laud her?

What gallant captains would not give their lives to guard her?

and at this from "The Triumph of Victoria," by the President of Magdalen:

Then on the sea and shore the cannon boomed,
All hail! Great Queen, on shore and sea renowned!

Mr. Austin Dobson's two quatrains are as happy as anything in the book:

I.

Who can dwell with greatness? Greatness is too high;
Flowers are for the meadow, suns are for the sky;—
Ah! but there is greatness in this land of ours,
High as is the sunlight, humble as the flowers!

II.

Queen, of thee the fable! Lady, thine the fate!
Royal, and yet lowly, lowly, and yet great;—
Great in far dominion, great in pomp of years,
Greater still as woman, greatest in thy tears.

In the current number of the Puritan some particulars of the progress of Mr. Morley's Life of Gladstone are communicated by Mr. Herbert Field. This sentence is sanguine: "Probably the publication of the Life will not only awaken a new enthusiasm with regard to its subject, but will synchronise with a renaissance of many of Mr. Gladstone's views." The probable date of publication of the Life is said to be 1901. In the same number of the Puritan Mr. Richard Le Gallienne is permitted to dissuade its readers from joining the Church of Rome.

A VERY interesting gloss upon Mr. W. F. Collier's reading of this passage in the Midsummer Night's Dream:

The moon, methinks, looks with a watery eye,
And when she weeps weeps every little flower,
Lamenting some enforced chastity—

to which we alluded in a review last week, is offered by a correspondent, "S. W. O." Mr. Collier, it will be remembered, argues that Shakespeare knew by an inspired intuition a botanical fact which science did not discover till many years after, namely that flowers do not propagate in wet weather. But says "S. W. O.": "Your reviewer's notice of a work by Mr. W. F. Collier (ACADEMY, December 16, p. 719) leads me to believe that the author has failed to perceive the true meaning of Shakespeare's lines. 'Enforced' is equivalent to violated or ravished: see sundry examples of this use in Schmidt's Shakespeare Lexicon, and cf. The Faerie Queene, i. 6. 4:

'And burnt his beastly hart t'efforce her chastitie.'

ARCHBISHOP BENSON, whose biography we notice elsewhere, attended the funeral of Robert Browning in the Abbey as a private mourner. Afterwards he made this interesting entry in his diary:

Life wears apace, when I think how I remember Browning beginning, and all the world finding him too new-fangled for anything and queer beyond endurance—and that I have seen him laid to rest in Poets' Corner. I wonder whether I have anywhere put down a walk with Bradley and Tennyson. Bradley had been reading me The Grammarian's Funeral—and he said, 'We'll ask Tennyson whether Browning's writing at large is poetry or no.' Tennyson's answer was, 'I'll think about it.' In a walk a week later apropos of nothing he observed, 'I have thought, and it is.' We had no idea for a moment as to what he spoke of.

"S. G." writing in the Pall Mall Gazette, tells the following story of the late Archbishop of Canterbury and Dodo: "Just after Dodo had taken the town by storm, Archbishop Benson went down to Tonbridge School, of which he was Visitor, to preside at a special function. There was a large gathering, and the Archbishop made a speech, in which he dwelt on the bygone customs of English public school life, many of which, he said, 'are now as extinct as the—'. Then he paused. It was not hard to divine the traditional simile which was on his tongue. A smile went round the room, spreading till it broke into a burst of laughter, in which the Archbishop joined. The sentence was never finished." But the advertisement, we might add, was.

Mr. A. C. BENSON, though young, is rapidly becoming one of our weightiest and most voluminous authors. In the space of one week two books from his pen have reached this office. One, the life of his father, extends to two volumes with an aggregate of 1,500 pages and a weight of 4 lb. 12 oz., and the other, Fasti Etonenses, has 536 pages and weighs 3 lb. 8 oz. The total number of pages in one week's harvest is therefore 2,036, and the total weight 8½ lbs. avoidupois.

THE following original sonnet to Eton stands on the threshold of Mr. Benson's book:

TO ETON.

Mother of men, my mother, fair, and free,
And gracious—and shall I, thy servant raise
Faint voice to swell thy immemorial praise?
Eton, whose mightiest sons are bold to be Thy champions, and thy humblest children's plea
For greatness, is thy greatness. Time that lays Hard hands on camp and castle, smiles and stays
His ruinous course to crown and quicken thee.
Some vast unshaken spirit seems to brood
Among thy halls, beside thy silver stream,
Old as old time, and young as yesterday,
Which to thy teaming sons doth hourly say,
"High be thy hope, my child, and pure thy dream,
"Laugh and be glad—have leisure to be good!"

At the present moment the word courage is kept exclusively for the absent-minded, but we think a little ought to be conceded to the gentlemen who have assisted to make the Nova Anthologia Oxoniensis. This work, which is edited by Prof. Robinson Ellis and Mr. A. D. Godley, contains some of the most intrepid assaults on difficult passages that were ever brought together. One gentleman, indeed, has provided a Greek version of a portion of Tennyson's "Northern Farmer."

OTHER translations from Tennyson are, by the way, to be found in Poèmes Divers d'Alfred Tennyson, by M. Léon Morel, which Messrs. Hachette have just sent to us. As a taste of M. Morel's quality, we give three stanzas from "Locksley Hall":

Mes amis, laissez-moi, pour une heure, au silence,
Tandis que l'aube est pâle encoir;
Laissez-moi seul, et, quand vous voudrez ma présence,
Faites sonner l'appel du cor.

L'Amour alors, prenant le sablier du Temps;
Le tourne en ses mains de lumière;
Chaque secousse, fit s'écouler les moments
En sable d'or dans l'heureux verre.
Et l'Amour, saisissant la harpe de la Vie,
Frappa les cordes puissamment;
Frappa celle du Moi qui, dans une harmonie,
Passa loin de nous en tremblant.

Amy's husband, the clown, becomes in the translation "ce rustre."

ENGLISH publishers, it seems, have still much to learn. We read in the Conservator the following testimony to the Roycroft printing press in East Aurora, which has just put forth an edition of the Ancient Mariner: "An auroral beauty attracts to the Roycroft book the hearty concurrence of the eye. I see better, hear better, and literature tastes sweeter, when I feast with the philistines of this New York plantation. Old books go to Aurora to be re-created. New books go to Aurora to get an auspicious start."

MR. FRANCIS WATT is contributing to the forthcoming number of the Anglo-Saxon Review a study of Sir George Mackenzie, Lord Advocate under Charles II. and James II., the "Bloody Advocate Mackenzie" of "Wandering Willie's Tale" in Redgauntlet.

THE late Mr. Bernard Quaritch, of whom we speak elsewhere, was very intimate with Mr. Gladstone, and he once told an interesting story of the G.O.M. It was during an exciting political period, and Mr. Gladstone had been announced as immediately starting upon his Midlothian campaign. The same day the statesman called upon Mr. Quaritch, and asked for books bearing on the provincial church councils of the eleventh and twelfth centuries! Even Mr. Quaritch was surprised, and he asked the G.O.M. what he was going to do with such books at such a time. "Oh," replied Mr. Gladstone, rather surprised at such an absurd question, "I am going to take them with me to read in the train." Mr. Quaritch never forgot those who had been good to him when he was poor. When he began his London life his earliest venture as a bookseller was some educational books, with which he travelled from east to west of London without success, till his first order was given by Mr. Smith, now of North-street, Brighton. This circumstance was, of course, never forgotten by Mr. Quaritch, who ever afterwards retained a warm friendship for Mr. Smith, who was an old bookseller like himself. Mr. Quaritch's dearest purchase was the Psalter printed by Faust and Schoeffer in 1409, for which he gave £4,950. He had five copies of the famous Mazarin Bible printed in 1455, the dearest being £3,980 and the cheapest £59. It was Oliver Wendell Holmes who gave Mr. Quaritch the title of "Prince of Bibliopoles."

Mr. Punch announces this week, with appropriate comicality, his new plans for 1900.

To all whom it may concern, and there is no one on this habitable globe whom this matter does not concern, these presents:

On and after the first week of the New Year, with the number to be dated January 3, 1900, Mr. Punch will give, then and thenceforward, four and twenty pages, all told, at the old established price of Threepence, in which every week will be comprised the special feature of the new issue, a story complete in one number, or "to be continued in our next" and in our next after that, as the case may be, by writers already eminent, or whose title to eminence it would be hazardous to question after their appearance among the "Extra Pages" in the distinguished service of Mr. Punch.

The first story will be contributed by Mr. Conan Doyle, who, Mr. Punch reminds his readers, is a connexion of Dicky Doyle, and, therefore, of H. B.

Bibliographical.

So the Argosy is to have a new editor, and issue from the house of Mr. George Allen instead of that of Messrs. Macmillan, who received it so recently from Mr. Bentley. It would be pleasant if it should again come within the limits of real literature. One remembers very well the earlier volumes. No. I. came out in December, 1865, with the imprimatur of Messrs. Low & Co. Among those contributing to it were Charles Reade (with the first chapters of "Griffith Gaunt"), Miss Ingelow, Miss Isa Craig, Miss Power Cobbe, Arminius Vámbéry, Alexander Smith, Dr. George Macdonald, Mr. Robert Buchanan, and the versatile, but almost forgotten, writer—W. B. Rands—who described himself variously as "Matthew Browne," "Henry Holbeach," and what not. Rands and Buchanan did some of their best work for the Argosy. Among other contributors were Mrs. Oliphant, Miss Rossetti, Miss A. B. Edwards, William Allingham, Henry Kingsley, and so forth. The third number bore the imprint of Alexander Strahan, who had naturally a tenderness for men and things Scotch. "Griffith Gaunt" was followed by Dr. Macdonald's "Robert Falconer," which, I fear, was not a happy choice. Nevertheless, the first four half-yearly volumes were very interesting, and are well worth re-reading at this time of day. With the fifth volume began the régime of Mrs. Henry Wood, who lived to control the forty-second; since then her son, Mr. Charles Wood, has held sway. And there is no reason why the Argosy should not again be what it was in 1865-66—a light, bright miscellany, with a close affinity to literature.

Talking of magazines, there is a new one called the Charing Cross. This is a case of an old title revived. A Charing Cross magazine was started in 1873, and seems to have struggled on, under successive editors, till 1879. So long as we have a Cornhill and a Temple Bar, and the like, there can obviously be no objection to a Charing Cross; but I am not sure that such titles are well chosen. They have, as a rule, the drawback of being utterly irrelevant.

They say that Dr. Ibsen is arranging the materials on which his authorised biography is by and by to be based. Up to now the only "life" of the poet-dramatist in English has been that which was translated from the original work by Jaeger and published in 1890. Before that, we had had to be content with the biographical sketch prefixed by Miss H. F. Lord to her English version of A Doll's House in 1882. Of late years there have been magazine articles galore, but the best recent sketch of Dr. Ibsen is that which Mrs. Tweedie included in her Winter Jaunt to Norway, about five years ago.

We shall soon want a bibliography of Ibsen. That he was first expounded to the English public by Mr. Edmond Gosse everybody knows (see Studies in the Literature of Northern Europe, 1879). A lady named Catherine Ray is credited with a translation of Emperor and Galilean, published in 1876; but I fear that that made no special mark. In 1880 there was published, in Copenhagen, an English version by T. Weber of A Doll's House. This was followed by the above-named version by Miss Lord, published in London (1882). In 1886 came The Pillars of Society, and Other Plays, in the "Camelot" series. To 1889 belongs the version of Rosmersholm made by Mr.

Louis N. Parker, now one of the most prominent of our playwrights. Not until 1890, I believe, did Mr. Archer begin to issue his translations of the Prose Dramas of the Master. In that year came Eleanor Marx's version of The Lady from the Sea. Then in 1891 we had the first version—Mr. Wilson's—of Brand, and the first version of Hedda Gabler, followed by Peer Gynt (1892), The Master Builder (1893), Little Eyolf (1895), John Gabriel Borkman (1897).

Since 1879, and putting aside Mr. Archer's polemics in the press, the expositions of Dr. Ibsen in English have been few. They include The Quintessence of Ibsenism, by Mr. Shaw (1891), the Lectures, by Mr. P. H. Wicksteed (1892), A Commentary on the Works, by H. H. Boyesen (1894), Ibsen: a Lecture, by Sir E. R. Russell (1894), Ibsen on His Merits, by Sir E. R. Russell and Mr. P. C. Standing (1897), and Dr. Brandes' Ibsen and Bjornson (1899). Gleanings from Ibsen, made by E. A. Keddell and P. C. Standing, appeared in 1897.

The late Mr. Quaritch left behind him something more than the reputation of a great connoisseur and seller of books. There were, for example, his Catalogue of Oriental Literature (1865), his General Catalogue of Books (began in 1868), his contributions to the Opuscula and Miscellanies of the "Odd Volumes" (1880-83), his Reprints of Rare Books (1885-88), his Collection of Facsimiles, from examples of historic or artistic book-binding (1889), and his discourse on Palaeography, published privately, with plates, in 1894. His catalogues are a distinct boon to the bibliographer.

If a bibliography of Ibsen is wanted, surely we want one of Eton and Etonians. Mr. Cust's History of Eton College has been quickly followed by Mr. Benson's Festi Etonenses, and one would like to know where the procession of Eton literature is to end. Etonians have always been very fond of writing about their old school. There was a book of Reminiscences in 1831, another of Memorials in 1844, and a third of Recollections in 1870. Note may be made, also, of Eton School Days (by B. Hemming), in 1864, of A Day of My Life, by an Eton Boy (1877), and of Eton of Old, 1811-22 (1892). Additions to these might easily be made. Then there is the literature made at Eton by Etonians—such books as Musæ Etonenses (1834), Lighter Hours (1843), and poems on New Zealand (1842), and Poland (1864). Many are the School Lists and College Magazines. Since Gray, the poetical celebrants of Eton have included Capel Lofft (1806), Praed, and Mr. Swinburne (1891), whose Ode to Eton was inspired by genuine affection. To have been an Eton boy is to make a very powerful appeal to Mr. Swinburne's good nature.

At a moment when a subscription is being made for the benefit of Mr. John Augustus O'Shea, now (alas!) permanently disabled, it may be interesting to give a list of his published volumes, which constitute his claim to the sympathy of men of letters. It runs as follows: Leaves from the Life of a Special Correspondent (1885), An Iron-bound City; or, Five Months of Peril and Privation [during the Siege of Paris] (1886), Romantic Spain: a Record of Personal Experience (1887), Military Mosaics: a Set of Tales (1888), Mated for the Morgue: a Tale of the Second Empire (1889), Roundabout Recollections (1892), and (with Mr. S. J. McKenna) Brave Men in Action, 1899.

Great is the vitality of The History of the Life of Thomas Ellwood, Written by his Own Hand, which dates from 1714. A fourth edition of this popular work came out in 1791, and reprints of it appeared in 1826, 1837, 1855, 1877, and 1883—that in the last-named year figuring in Henry Morley's "Universal Library." Now yet another edition is to be vouchsafed to us, and no doubt it will be well received.

A correspondent, writing from Leicester, reminds me that Lord Beaconsfield's sonnet on the Duke of Wellington was printed by Mr. William Sharp in his Sonnets of this Century ("Canterbury Poets" series, 1887). It figures, by the way, in the Notes—not in the body of the work.

Primate of All England.

The Life of Edward White Benson, Sometime Archbishop of Canterbury. By his Son, Arthur Christopher Benson. 2 vols. (Macmillan. 36s. net.)

THIS massive biography of 1,500 pages leaves so many impressions on the mind that it is convenient to name one impression which it does not leave. It does not impress the mind with a deep sense of awe in contemplating the office of Archbishop of Canterbury. It is curious how, in laying down the last volume, one has the memory of having read only the life of a genial and versatile clergyman. Pomp, massiveness, grandeur—call it what you will—is lacking in the picture. There is surely a touch of irony in the fact that the only passage in the book in which the office of the Primate is deliberately exalted occurs in a bishop's after-dinner speech. The dinner was given to Archbishop Benson in celebration of his appointment by some of his old school-fellows; and Dr. Lightfoot, then Bishop of Durham, was in the chair. The Bishop began to speak of the glory and dignity of the office to which his friend had been called. It is in no spirit of mischief that we print his remarks side by side with a passage from a later chapter. The contrast they afford is not irrelevant:

I was invited to a dinner given in honour of the Archbishop by his old school-fellows. His most intimate friend, Dr. Lightfoot, then Bishop of Durham, was in the chair. . . . The Bishop went on to speak of the grand and powerful position held by the Archbishop of Canterbury, as the recognised head of the whole English speaking race in communion with the Church of England throughout the world, a position which he regarded as little inferior even now to that of the Bishop of Rome, and destined at no distant date to be even greater.

On June 21 the Jubilee Service on the completion of the fiftieth year of the Queen's reign took place. . . . A special police pass had been issued to him to allow his carriage to pass through the streets when all other traffic was stopped. About an hour before the service began he left Lambeth. The carriage was stopped at the south end of Westminster Bridge, and not even the production of the pass convinced the inspector that we had any right to proceed. . . . My father got very angry, and at last said, in a loud voice: "Well, all I can say is, that unless you allow me to proceed there will be no service to-day." This made the inspector reflect, and he rode off to make inquiries, returning almost immediately with the profoundest apologies. The passage of the carriage was the signal for about a hundred of the crowd to break through the cordon of police, seize the carriage behind, and run with it, but one by one they were torn away, so that we arrived at the Abbey alone.

Imagine this or any similar contretemps occurring in the life of the Pope, or of the least of foreign cardinals. It is unthinkable. The truth is, that the Primacy is not yet understood, or rightly revered, of the people. A Primate is the most courtly and remote of personages; a little greater, but certainly more remote, than the Lord Chancellor. His dignity is a Court dignity, and his splendour is the splendour of great occasions. But as a living and visible patriarch and Vicar of Christ a Primate is a nebulous personage. Archbishop Benson had intuitions of this melancholy fact. He was sensitive to the "£15,000 a year" jibes of the Lambeth working-man, and on one occasion asked some working men to the Palace to hear his explanations of this position. Once he wrote in his diary:

Rode to Whitelands to visit it—all dismantled—and round Battersea. Thousands and thousands of workingmen lining the Embankment and bridges to see the race for Doggett's coat and badge, and of them all is one man per cent. in the least affected by the existence of the Church of England in his spiritual being, in his morals, in his affection? Do they feel her touch on them in love?

After this it is rather amusing to read the Archbishop's remarks, in his diary, on Cardinal Manning's intervention in the Dock Strike of 1889:

The Strike of the Dock Labourers continues. Manning, as his wont is, appears on the scene, drives through the crowd, enters the Committee Room; all that passes is to be confidential; reappears, drops (as if he didn't intend it) the word that "he hopes he has done some good," is loudly applauded by the crowd, drives off. Those who know the man, and his resourceful brain, his character and knowledge of dramatic effect, will not be deceived. All others will.

The significance of the sneer is not really weakened by the fact that, a few days later, the Archbishop admits that "Cardinal Manning has done well in London"; adding: "But why has my dear Bishop of London gone back and left it to him?" Even a reader who, like the present writer, is neither an Anglican nor a Catholic, may prefer the worst construction of Manning's presence at the Docks to the best construction of Benson's immurement in Lambeth. Another story which Benson tells against Manning is not without its recoil. In 1885 he writes:

An admirer of Manning told anecdotes illustrative of his skill and readiness, among others this:—A young fellow had joined the Romanists. The following Sunday the father of the young man made his way into the sacristy where Manning was unrobing after Mass among the priests. The poor father burst out with much indignation against the way in which his son had been secretly tampered with, persuaded to hold his tongue, and go to church regularly, until the moment of his reception. Manning drew himself up to his full height, stretched out his arm and long finger, and looking most impressive and ascetic as he stood still half-robed, said: "Hold! Man, you have blasphemed the Church of God—you have maligned the Ministers of His altar. You have hated the salvation of your son—and you yourself within three years will be a Catholic." All were profoundly struck—the father was speechless, and quietly went away. A little time afterwards my friend's informant said to Manning: "That was very astonishing. How did you know and feel so sure of what you uttered?" Manning said: "Well, my dear fellow, it was a very difficult situation; and I thought it might impress him."

The Primate doubtless thought this was a good story against the Cardinal, and no doubt it is; yet it shows Manning to have possessed a priestly power and dignity, intimate and available, to which the Primate himself had few pretensions.

It is curious that Mr. Benson seems unconscious of this missing element of priestly grandeur in his father's career. In his Preface he writes:

His [Archbishop Benson's] biography is simply the history of an intensely vivid nature, touching life at many points—through antiquity, history, art, religion, literature, and tradition, and throwing itself with equal ardour into all.

"Simply." Mr. Benson anticipates our criticism. For this (let the reader reflect) is written not of an artist, an author, a millionaire, or a man of the world—but of an Archbishop of Canterbury. We do not deny the right of an Archbishop to be many-sided; but this calm summary of Benson's career, his "intensely vivid nature, touching life at all points," is significant of the fact that whatever of grandeur and singleness the Primacy may lack, the Primate may lack the same qualities. Of the prescribed dignity of levées and occasions Benson had all that could be desired, yet he seems to have judged himself well when he writes:

The burden of all things seems to make me fidgety from head to foot, so that I feel little comfort in leisure. I want a greater soul and a calmer way of looking at things.

A great primate or not, Benson had the qualities by which alone the Primacy could be gained. He was one of those men whose advance it is rarely convenient for anyone to challenge. Masterful, clever, industrious, and brimming with vitality, he strode on, and the world fell back as he approached. His sheer abundance of life commanded success. He fatigued people by his mere presence. His son admits that it was "a strain to be alone with him" on this account, and Mr. Benson tells how even when he was silent he showed a burning vitality. "I have known what it was to feel physically breathless from the speed at which his mind was working, without a word being spoken." He had a passion for detail and contrivance. When he put stained-glass windows into the new chapel at Wellington he worked out designs which should "give the boys something to puzzle at." Many years after, revisiting the school, he was "amused" to find that he could no longer interpret his own symbolism. Of his father's table-talk Mr. Benson gives some curious examples.

On one occasion, a long discussion took place at dinner as to what would be the result if two engines, moving at different speeds, were attached to a train: it was contended that if the first were slower than the second, the second besides drawing the train would have to push the first as well; if the second were slower, the first engine would have to pull the train and the slower engine as well. The Archbishop took a decided and totally erroneous view and defended it with vehemence. The discussion raged all dinner, and afterwards. When all were in the drawing-room, it broke out afresh, the Archbishop growing more warm every moment. Then suddenly he returned to a distant table, and began to turn over a portfolio, and to call his daughter's attention to an inscription; while thus occupied, he said, in a low tone, "I ought not to argue! I am always insulting when I argue—don't you think I am?" My sister said: "I shouldn't have used that exact word—you have been vehement." "Oh, it's more than that," he said, "I can't help using insulting and personal language." He then began to think over the problem again, drawing little signs on paper, and argued the question again at breakfast and all the way while driving up to London, with little less vehemence.

Mr. Benson says: "I can hardly imagine any definite line of practical life which my father could not have pursued with success." We agree; but in such a remark there is a subterranean admission that Benson was not a great archbishop. He was a most successful man in the Church, and he had many fine and lovable qualities—qualities to which we fear we have not given sufficient prominence in this survey of the largest biography that has reached us for years. We are bound to say that we think this Life unnecessarily long. Mr. Gladstone is reported to have said of the Life of George Eliot that it was not a biography but a reticence. Of the Life of Archbishop Benson we might say it is not so much a biography as a Benson Exhibition. But it is an interesting, even amusing exhibition, and Mr. Benson is a frank and skilful guide.

Popular Egyptology.

Egyptian Ideas of the Future Life. By E. A. Wallis Budge, M.A., &c. Egyptian Magic. By the Same. (Kegan Paul. Each 3s. 6d.)

EGYPTIAN religion has always been, and probably always will be, a crux to the historian. Our knowledge of it is for the most part derived from what are, numerically, but a very few texts left by priests who did not know they were writing for posterity, and some passages in classical authors of the time when the Egyptian religion was on its last legs. If we add to this that the separate civilisation of Egypt endured, with many periods of ebb and flow, for about five thousand years, and that during that period each of its forty-two provinces worshipped at least a different group of gods from its neighbours, it will be seen that the summariser's task is by no means an easy one. Should he attempt to give ever so slight an account of the factors really necessary for the solution of the problem, he will produce so dry and bald a catalogue of gods and ceremonies that the student will not be able to see the wood for the trees. Should he dilate upon those which appear to us the most salient, he may find himself holding up as a type of Egyptian religion a form of worship which was persistently ignored by the vast majority of ancient Egyptians.

Out of this impasse Dr. Budge has chosen a way which has the merit of courage. He divides the different characteristics of Egyptian religion not according to their age or their popularity, but according to their moral worth. All those ideas which are, as he says, "sublime" he puts into his first volume, which bears on its cover the sole title of "Egyptian Religion"; all those which are, in his view, debased or superstitious are relegated to the second volume and labelled "Egyptian Magic." The dichotomy is not always strictly observed, for if the knowledge of divine names touched upon in the fourth chapter of his first volume be not magic it is hard to see what is. But this is a point of little importance. The principle which underlays his division is a good one, and if for religion we were to write the ideas of the educated, and for magic those of the uneducated, it might be applied to other religions than that of Egypt. His view of the ideas in his first category will also please those who prefer to everything a clear outline. All the Egyptian gods, according to him, were but varying "forms or manifestations, or phases, or attributes" of Râ, the Sun-god, who was on the same authority the type or symbol of the "One God who was self-existent, immortal, invisible, eternal, omniscient, almighty, inscrutable," and the maker of all that is, such god having, as he has elsewhere said, "all the essential attributes of the Christian's God." From this he proceeds to an account of Osiris, the divine man who was slain, buried, and afterwards rose again to confer the same benefit of resurrection upon his worshippers. He then gives a catalogue of Egyptian gods and their attributes which does not err on the side of fulness, and a full and clear description of the elaborate Judgment of the Dead, of the ideas of morality which the belief in it involved, and of the mummification of the body which it made necessary. A similarly clear description of the beatification of the justified, and of the curious subdivision of man's spiritual part in which the Egyptians believed, completes this volume, while the second contains an excellent account of the different amulets found in Egypt, of the funeral ceremonies of Pharaonic times, and several stories of magical and other superstitious practices, in search of which the author has gone somewhat far afield. With all the material relics of the Egyptian worship, Dr. Budge has had, as Keeper of the Egyptian Antiquities in the British Museum, a thorough acquaintance at first hand, and these chapters show that he has made full use of his opportunities. Although exception might be taken to a few of his statements in this connexion, they are not made without authority, and the uninstructed reader, to whom we suppose these volumes are especially addressed, will find few safer or better guides.

When, however, we come to examine Dr. Budge's theory of the central idea which he imagines to animate the whole religious belief of the Egyptians, we can hardly follow him so implicitly. It may at once be conceded that from the XVIIIth Dynasty onwards, or perhaps from an earlier date, all Egyptian divinities showed a great tendency to coalesce with different forms of the Sun-god and by so doing lost something of their strictly provincial character. From this Champollion-Figeac, as far back as 1828, drew the inference that the polytheistic worship of the Egyptians concealed the belief in a single god whose representative was the sun; and the idea was taken up and extended by the late Emmanuel de Rougé and Brugsch Pasha, the most celebrated living exponent of the theory being M.

Pierret, one of the curators of the museum of the Louvre. Dr. Budge does not directly quote these authorities—rightly thinking, perhaps, that such names would say little to the ordinary reader—and gives as proof of his assertions a quantity of texts, such as: "God is One and alone, and none other existeth with Him; God is the One, the One who hath made all things"—in which, as he says, the Egyptian word for god is employed without article, and with apparently the same significance that we should give to it in English. Now, we are not concerned ourselves to dispute the correctness of Dr. Budge's construction of these texts, but we think it well to point out that the best and most recent authorities think them to mean the exact contrary of what he here says they mean. Thus M. Maspero, who is admittedly the greatest of living Egyptologists, and who has said that he was once an adherent of Brugsch's monotheistic theory, was converted by a study of the texts themselves to the opposite doctrine that the Egyptian religion, from first to last, taught the belief in not one but many gods. His latest pronouncement on the subject [Hist. Anc. des Peuples de l'Orient: les Origines, p. 152] says, after admitting that certain theologians among the priests sought to combine the attributes of many deities in one:

But the god towards whom they were pressing had nothing in common with the god of our religions and of our modern philosophies. He was not, as ours is for us, simply "God." He was Tum, the unique and solitary god at Heliopolis; Anhur-Shu, the unique and solitary god at Sebennyus and Thinis. The unity of Tum did not exclude that of Anhur-Shu, but each of these gods, single in his own domain, ceased to be so in the domain of the other. The ever-alert and jealous spirit of feudalism was opposed to the dogma dimly perceived in the temples triumphing there over the local religions and extending over the entire country. Egypt knew as many unique gods as she had great cities and important temples. She never accepted the unique god, God.

Or shall we take the words of Prof. Wiedemann (Religion of the Ancient Egyptians, p. 109), a writer of greater weight on Egyptian religion than perhaps any Englishman:

Many passages [he says] are found in Egyptian inscriptions where it is stated that "god"—i.e., "a god," the indefinite article not being generally expressed in Egyptian—is praised. . . . It has often been concluded that thereby is meant the one god who is from everlasting to everlasting, the god of the Jewish prophets and even of Christendom. Such an interpretation is, as a matter of fact, impossible. The same texts which make these assertions speak of other deities as co-existent, and show that in using the word "god" the scribe was thinking only of the god most near to him, the god of his nome, "the god belonging to the city" of the texts.

These are opinions which from the position of their authors are entitled to the respect of every Egyptologist. Had Dr. Budge seen his way to refute them, he might have made the attempt in any of the technical periodicals devoted to the subject. So far as we know, he has not done so, and we, therefore, think it a pity that he should at once ignore and contradict them in a manual intended for the use of the general public.

ERE on my bed my limbs I lay,
It hath not been my use to pray
With moving lips or bended knees,
But silently, by slow degrees,
My spirit I to Love compose,
In humble trust mine eyelids close
With reverential resignation,
No wish conceived, no thought exprest,
Only a sense of supplication;
A sense all o'er my soul imprest
That I am weak, yet not unblest,
Since in me, round me, everywhere,
Eternal strength and wisdom are.

Ford Madox Brown's Diary.

Pre-Raphaelite Diaries and Letters. Edited by William Michael Rossetti. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

THE diary of a sincere artist is necessarily a valuable document, and it is the auto-record of several years of Madox Brown's life, when he was still a young man, that makes this book noteworthy. Some later years of his journal have already been given in Mr. Hueffer's life of the painter, but since the publication of that work Mr. William Michael Rossetti has discovered among his papers the portions which for the first time are now printed. The triumphs and disappointments, the hopes and fears, the beliefs and misgivings of the artistic temperament may all be studied here. The only thing that is lacking is its gaiety.

"I have long intended beginning this journal," Madox Brown writes in September, 1847; "praise be God it is begun at last." Brown is now twenty-six; his only daughter, Lucy, is at school at her aunt's at Gravesend; he is working hard on the figure of Chaucer in his Seeds and Fruits of English Poetry, his studio being a rat-infested building in Clipstone-street, Marylebone. The loss of his wife is continually with him, together with that dissatisfaction with self that all serious artists know. Here is a day taken at random: "Got up at half-past five, got to work by seven. Painted in the King's cloak (study). Workwoman came; set her to make the gown for Chaucer [of German velvet, a bargain, six yards at 10½d.]; myself made ears for the jester's hood, and began a drawing of it. In the evening began drawing in the draperies of Milton on the canvas." The entry is not quite typical. Often we come upon a confession of late rising or a wasted day, with "I am a brute and a sleepy beast," or some such utterance. On other days people call and hinder him, including "that devil Miss C——." His average of work is, however, five hours. His best friends seem to be the Lucys—Charles Lucy, the painter, and his wife. Dante Gabriel Rossetti's name first occurs on March 25, 1848: "Elliott, Thomas and Rossetti called; the latter my first pupil." Here is another day: "Got up at quarter-past seven; to work by half-past eight at the third head of Chaucer; made it worse than before. Had Mrs. Yates for it. Worked till eleven at it—quite horrible. Afterwards painted the two hands rather well; then painted the hands of Gower and one foot of Wiclif pretty well. . . . I set to work again at half-past nine till eleven, and drew in the figure in the spandril with the lily (ten hours' work)." We have faith in the self-critical power of a man who records these details. On May 18, 1848, he tries to persuade Thomas (Mr. William Cave Thomas) that "to imitate the true tone of the model it must be painted so that, when held up beside it, it would not be like it in colour." In the autumn he visits Manchester, Liverpool, and the Lakes with Charles Lucy. At Liverpool he sees his Wiclif "up high," and thinks it looks "damned bad."

The diary hereafter slackens noticeably, and in March 1850 it ceases, or at least there is now no trace of its having been kept. In August, 1854, however, it reopens with some vigour. Brown is married again, and has become the father of another daughter, Katy (afterwards Mrs. Francis Hueffer). The diary begins with a summary of its author's achievements in the interval. Among other paintings was the "Baa Lamb," of which he writes thus:

The "Baa Lamb" picture was painted almost entirely in sunlight, which twice gave me a fever while painting. I used to take the lay figure out every morning, and bring it in at night, or if it rained. . . . My painting-room being on a level with the garden, Emma sat for the lady, and Kate for the child. The lambs and sheep used to be brought every morning from Clapham Common in a truck: one of them ate up all the flowers one morning in the garden, where they used to behave very ill. The background was painted on the Common.

Other pictures belonging to this period were "King Lear," "The Last of England," and "Windermere." To resume the diary proper: in August, 1854, Brown and his wife take a little trip to St. Albans for a holiday. Here is a longer extract than usual:

We should have thought more of the fields, no doubt, were we not so much used to them of late. However, one field of turnips against the afternoon sky did surprise us into exclamation, with its wonderful emerald tints. And then we passed a strange sight; two tall chimneys standing separately in a small space of ground (about a rod, I suppose); the rest covered with black-looking rubbish, some of it smoking, some children looking at it. This, the day before, had been a house, the home of a young couple married some three months, the man a wheelwright. Fire surprised them in bed the previous night, it would seem, and they had to escape as they were, in their bed-clothes. And here lay all that they possessed, flattened down into black ashes. I broke a tooth a day or two ago, and the gap seemed for some days hard to reconcile with my impressions of what forms ought to surround my tongue. If so it is with the remains of a decayed tooth, the gap caused by the loss of all one has must be harder still to realise at first. However, they are young, and no life was lost; and, as the man is not an artist, there is yet hope of prosperity in store for them. And now we are at the Peahen, and Emma has just gone to bed, and I am writing God knows to what purpose (but vanity). And we have spent six shillings getting here, which is sheer madness in the present state of our prospects; besides one bob wasted on a description of the Abbey—certainly the silliest little book that fool ever penned, the most complete do that ever I was subjected to; fifty pages of the most complete vacuity that ever small-country-town-bred numbskull, without a shade of learning, ingenuity, or imagination, could possibly have put into circulation.

One evening in September, 1854, needing a kitten for the picture "Work," "Emma and I went out after dark and stole one." In the same month we find this:

The only thing I can never bring myself to do with care is writing. This has always (I know not wherefore) appeared to me as base and mechanical, and in some way I am sure to make it disgraceful. Either I spell it wrong, and this I can't help and never could manage; or else I get a bad pen, and so blotch and scribble it that it is not readable; or else I get sleepy, and fill it up with iterations or faults of prosody, which must make me appear like a most illiterate ass, which, however, I am not. Oh for Woolner's precision—rare in a man of art! . . .

The birth of Oliver Madox Brown, on January 20, 1855, is thus recorded: "This morning, at half-past 12 a.m., dearest Emma was delivered of a son, my first. He is very red, a large nose, eyes and shape of face like a Calmuck Tartar, shape of head like a Bosjesman." A page or so later: "'An unsuccessful man is a bore,' Woolner says."

Two more extracts, and we must leave the diary. This is Brown's criticism of The Newcomes, dated August 18, 1855:

The Newcomes is done. The end, though a disappointment to me as construction, is, for pathos and delineation of the "human 'art,'" beyond anything he has yet done. No end of 'kerchiefs might be wetted over it; but I read it dry, being used to misery in its actual state. But the dénouement disappointed me, I own. Thackeray seems to have got them into a mess, and either to lack the skill or the courage to get them out of it. In my humble opinion, Ethel should have died just as Clive would have been enabled to marry her; after which he should have taken to art seriatim, and have achieved a position, and so have learned the value of suffering. Clive should have wept her, and then turned serious and virtuous, and married someone just to take care of boy; or his wife should not have died, and they should at length have loved each other, and been happy in the end. This would have been far more moral, more probable, and more satisfactory to me. But he is the great word-artist of now.

With respect to seriatim, "Brown had a bad habit," says Mr. W. M. Rossetti, "of using this Latin word as if it meant 'seriously.'" The other entry describes Brown's visit to a dealer with "The Last of England," and other works:

Packed my five pictures in a cart, and at 10 a.m. started on my way to London, down the new Finchley-road—I driving, because it was too heavy to sit both of us in front, and perched up behind was anything but comfort. However, the pony, being a mettlesome beast, had no idea of going unless his own master thrashed him, and seemed to despise my attempts in that line; so we had to change seats. It is Barnet fair, and we were taken for return showmen on the road. As I got to the door in Percy-street, old White was knocking there. He looked at the picture for about one hour, and was most warm in his eulogium. I said last figure was £200 with copyright, or £150 without. I think he did not intend to buy when he came, but he seemed loth to leave it. At last he said: "I want you to give me copyright in, and will give you a bill at six months for £150." So I said, as it was him, I would take it; indeed, I would not have done so otherwise. Then he took the pencil-drawing for £7. He promises speedy fortune, and that in two years more I shall no longer sell my pictures to him, but command the highest prices in the art-market, and only give him a picture for remembrance of old times. Amen! say I.

These pictures and the man who painted them are now more rightly estimated. But in those days his struggles were bitter and unceasing, and his own record of them, simple and straightforward, is a document to be laid to heart. A sardonic humorist might profitably bind it up with the Life of Millais. Mr. W. M. Rossetti's editorial work is useful and discreet, but we wish he had told us something as to the character of the excisions which he has made. The extracts given in this volume, he says, "form perhaps hardly a half of the whole." What is the other half like?

The rest of the book consists of unimportant letters of Dante Gabriel Rossetti's and of Mr. W. M. Rossetti's journal of the P.R.B.

Mild Correspondence.

Letters from Lady Jane Coke to her Friend Mrs. Eyre at Derby (1747-1758). Edited by Mrs. Ambrose Rathborne. (Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 7s. 6d.)

"CHANGES will happen, and I have lived too long in the world to wonder at anything." Changes indeed have taken place since this was written in 1754 by Lady Jane Coke, widow of Mr. Holt and wife of Mr. Coke of Longford, Derbyshire. Lady Jane was the last representative of the Wharton family, sister to the famous Philip, Duke of Wharton, who—eloquent, scatter-brained, and reckless—contracted a "Fleet" marriage at the age of sixteen, and died in hopeless beggary at thirty-three.

Among the "wax lights, fine dresses, fine jokes, fine plate, and fine equipages" of the last century's "brilliant, jiggling, smirking Vanity Fair," Lady Jane's dignified simplicity of temperament reveals itself in strong, though passive, contrast to those blatant qualities more commonly in vogue among the women of the day. "One of the agreeablest girls upon earth" that world-famed gossip, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, calls her, and there is certainly no venom to be found in Lady Jane's pleasant correspondence to her friend Mrs. Eyre, formerly a Miss Cotton of Etwall Hall. Merely the evidences of a pleasant wit, a happy knack of turning phrases, even some hint of epigram. "The Prince of Wales's children acted Cato better than anybody ever did—but Royal children, you know, always excel," she comments, on one occasion; and, again, "As for fashions, according to the English custom, we follow the French Ambassadress"!

It is of this reign—George the Second's—that Thackeray writes regretfully: "Show me some good person—find me, among these gay people, someone that I can love." In the foreground of one's mental picture of the period certain prominent, if scarcely pleasing, women crowd—the beautiful, though often vulgar, Miss Gummings, afterwards respectively Lady Coventry and the Duchess of Hamilton, mobbed at Assembly, rout and "folly"; Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, queen of letter-writers, caustic, entertaining, a woman "of parts," few of which she allowed to escape the world's observation; Lady Vane, nicknamed "Lady Frail," whose adventures Smollett immortalised; Miss Chudleigh, the bigamist, whose flagrant indiscretions, to use the lightest term, were rewarded by the King's kiss, "against all precedent," at a drawing-room "in the circle"; reckless Fanny Murray, who, according to Walpole, complained one night of lack of money, and on being given a £20 note, said: "D—n your £20! What does it signify?"—and ate it—between two pieces of bread and butter.

No wonder Thackeray called this period a "dreadfully selfish time," and spoke of it as of a "city of the dead" . . . with its "godless intrigues and feasts, crowds, pushing and eager and struggling, rouged and lying and fawning."

The life of Lady Jane appears from these records to have been a curiously restful life. She seems to have made her own atmosphere, to have kept the "sovereignty of the soul" undisturbed alike in London or the country. Her doings were advertised with no blare of trumpets, her attitude towards life remaining throughout rather that of the spectator of the play than the leading lady. Yet her position as wife of Vice-Chamberlain to Queen Caroline demanded her presence at certain court functions: she was emphatically "in things"; she knew the personages of the day, played the card-game of "Bragg," the period's excuse for gambling, with the best, paid such attention to fashions as behove the "queen" of Derbyshire county society. But in spite of this her actual pleasures appear to have been extraordinarily simple ones. She remained unmoved in a crowd where other women were constantly harrying and jostling each other. Her main delight seems to be the doing of some small kindness: the thoughtful remembrance and reward of a child's taste; the execution of some small commission for her friend; the seeking of patterns of novelties in mantua-making and headgear for Mrs. Eyre; the setting of jewels for her as "the mode decreed." On one occasion she even refrained from buying silk for her till the price was less prohibitive. In short, she gives every evidence of being a gentle-hearted lady who, if she seldom read books (there is no mention of her sharing her brother's literary tastes), studied those human documents, the men and women among whom she lived, and from them learned at least one lesson—how to dispense a kind and gracious influence.

It seems strange, in these days of easy travelling, to find a woman of fashion like Lady Jane content with what would now appear a very limited horizon. London, Windsor, Tunbridge Wells, Bath, Sunbury-on-Thames, occasional visits to the country, this is the extent of her travel after her husband's death in 1750. London life is not very "agreeable" to her, to quote the jargon of the day. "The weather is much too fine for London," she writes in the same year, "yet I am here wishing myself extremely in the country." Travelling in those days was of course a complicated process, but the repose of her mind seems to express itself in this disinclination of Lady Jane to undertake any very long journey.

Mrs. Rathborne, the editor of these letters, has done her task well. She explains the main points concerning the persons and events alluded to in the correspondence—and no more. The letters speak for themselves. They throw as pleasant a light upon the period as their pleasant author's personality must have thrown upon her companions.

Of the Stage, Stagey.

The Drama of Yesterday and To-day. By Clement Scott. 2 vols. (Macmillan & Co. 36s. net.)

Sir Arthur Sullivan: Life-Story, Letters, and Reminiscences. By Arthur Lawrence. (James Bowden. 6s.)

Sir Henry Irving: a Record and Review. By Charles Hiatt. (Bell. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE simultaneous appearance of these volumes is characteristic of the period. There can be no question that the Stage now occupies the mind of the English public much more than it ever did before. A reaction seems almost inevitable, but, in the meantime, the theatre and things theatrical loom very large in the popular eye. That they do so is due very much to the men who are the central figures of the three books above noted. Whatever else one may think of Mr. Clement Scott's work as a writer, one cannot deny to him an overwhelming—an almost pathetically overwhelming—enthusiasm for the Stage. He claims to have devoted his life to the theatre, and so, practically, he has. He is, to be sure, "the poet of the seaside"; but that is only during the slack theatrical months of August and September. If Mr. Scott did not go to the playhouse during those months, it was, we suspect, because there was nothing to see there. He calls his latest production The Drama of Yesterday and To-day. It could have had no more misleading title. Very little indeed has Mr. Scott to say, in these two distressingly bulky volumes, about the Drama as such. There are the usual rhapsodies about Tom Robertson and Sardou, but for the higher aims and forms of drama Mr. Scott has shown but little sympathy. His excursions in Shakespearean criticism have always been those of an honest Philistine. He did his best to suppress Ibsen and Maeterlinck (in England), and to thwart and discourage Mr. Pinero in his efforts to break through the commonplace. No; what has attracted and retained the devotion of Mr. Scott is not the Drama, but the Stage and things Stagey—the Stage as a source of entertainment for the middle classes and a means of livelihood for the Player. Wade through the thousand and odd pages of The Drama of Yesterday and To-day, and you will find that what has most interested Mr. Scott during all his years of playgoing has been the Acting that he has seen. Apart from Robertson and Sardou, his heroes and his heroines are "histrions." Of what is truly dramatic as opposed to theatrical, of the ablest writers of drama pure and simple, he shows next to no appreciation; while over actors and acting his mind, it is obvious, broods delightedly.

By the players, from the oldest to the youngest "leading ladies" on whom he bestows his praises, Mr. Scott's new volumes, one can well believe, will be perused ecstatically. For the general reader they will have little or no magnetism. None but the most inveterate and absorbed of playgoers would have the patience to push their way through this morass of more or less old matter. In producing this work Mr. Scott has been regrettably ill-advised. He might have written his autobiography, or he might have penned a history of the Victorian stage. He has sought to combine the two, and the result, from a literary point of view, is unsatisfactory. The autobiographical element is fragmentary, and the historical is incomplete; the whole is inartistically welded. Opening with a sketch of the London stage in 1841, Mr. Scott after a few pages suddenly breaks off to quote a long account of the death of Tyrone Power. He is for ever going off like this at a tangent, for ever interrupting his narrative in order to drag in an extract from some well-known work. In the first volume, especially, the use of quotation marks is incessant. Even the chapter headings are in inverted commas! And the frequent digressions in the way of biographical memoranda about players and playwrights are so bald and arid in manner as to suggest resort rather to the pages of books of reference than to the memory of the autobiographer himself. Shapely this work certainly is not, and one could wish that Mr. Scott would now sit down and cut out of it all that is not genuine autobiography. Even then it would have the drawback of being in the main little more than a repetition of what Mr. Scott has been saying in the newspapers and magazines for many a year past. As it stands, it is a display of monumental enthusiasm, but of little more, for it is not sufficiently systematic and comprehensive in method to be of much service to the student of stage history. The most popular feature of the work, we should say, would be the large number of portraits of players, playwrights, managers, and critics with which it has wisely been endowed.

The book about Sir Arthur Sullivan has been put together by Mr. Arthur Lawrence, but with much aid, apparently, from Sir Arthur himself—in fact, the volume is a notable specimen of what may be called “biography by interview.” The subject is unwilling, perhaps, to tell all the story himself, but he is willing to assist some other person in the telling. He consents to answer questions, and he supplies, perhaps, documents such as letters and so forth. This is what Sir Arthur seems to have done for Mr. Lawrence, and the result is a narrative which, we may be sure, will have many gratified readers. Sir Arthur, it appears, is of mingled Irish and Italian descent: here, no doubt, we have the sources of his flow of melody and his sense of humour. He has written oratorios and cantatas, and at least one “grand” opera, but will go down to posterity, if he goes at all, hand-in-hand with Mr. Gilbert. He has penned some charming drawing-room songs, but his chief title to honour is the fact that he collaborated in the unique series of which “Trial by Jury” was the opening item. He and his colleague, together, invented a new pleasure for all who can be touched by tunefulness and wit combined.

No one will grudge Sir Arthur Sullivan his biography, though one trusts it is premature by many a year. Mr. Charles Hiatt has produced a new memoir of Sir Henry Irving, probably because he had already celebrated Miss Ellen Terry in that fashion. For style Mr. Hiatt has little feeling; about acting he knows, seemingly, even less. But for all that, his account of the career of Sir Henry is the best before the public—the fullest and the most generously illustrated. Mr. Hiatt has more to say about the actor's Manchester days than had any previous biographer. His attempt to fix Sir Henry's position in the hierarchy of the stage comes a little too early. These things are best left to posterity. Meanwhile, this volume is a significant testimony to the mark made by its subject on his own generation.

More Children's Books.

THREE weeks ago we said something about the economical nonsense verse that has taken the place of the more copious outpourings which Lewis Carroll and Edward Lear offered. Mr. J. J. Bell, the author of the verse in Jack of All Trades (Lane), does something to redress the balance: he really has a gift for nonsense, a gaiety of metre, and a free-and-easy productive power. But he does not care for children as his great predecessors did. Here is a specimen poem:

I'd rather be a cyclist,
Than any other beast.
For tho' he slays he never stays
Upon the slain to feast.

It's pleasant to remember,
While lying on the stones,
How, tho' you're dead, you needn't dread
That he will pick your bones.

He comes! You fall! He's gone! That's all!
He doesn't mind the least.
Oh, I'd rather be a cyclist
Than any other beast.

We cannot praise Mr. Charles Robinson's pictures, which affect ugliness and smudginess deliberately. Mr. Robinson is a delicate artist who can make beautiful things. Why should a false idea of pleasing children lead him to make hideous ones?

Under the title Told in the Twilight (Pearsons) Miss Blanche McManus has brought together a number of the best-known stories, either in their own words or newly adapted for small listeners. These include “Robin Hood” and “Dick Whittington,” “The Ugly Duckling” and “The Pied Piper.” To these she has put pictures. We reproduce the effective cover.

Under the title Beasts: Thumbnail Studies in Pets (Macmillan) Mr. Wardlaw Kennedy describes some of the animals that he has tamed and amused himself with. Among these is a mongoose. According to Mr. Kennedy the publication of The Jungle Book, with the story of Rikki-Tikki-Tavi in it, set a fashion in keeping mongooses which still obtains; and apparently Rikki-Tikki is the name to which they all answer. Mr. Kennedy has also kept an armadillo called Sennacherib (shortened to “Pig”), a cat named Cottles, a potto or kinkajou, and various other pets. He writes about them with agreeable high spirits, but his Latinity is often above the heads of those of his readers who will be most interested in his experiences. “Esuriant” and “pavid,” for example, are hard words for small people. A more delicately charming animal book is the translation of Gautier's Ménagerie Intime which Mrs. William Chance has made under the title of A Domestic Menagerie (Stock). Gautier's cats are, of course, the most exquisite cats in literature. Further pleasant information concerning the cat will be found in Tiptail: The Adventures of a Black Kitten (Lamley), by Tertie Bennett—a pretty little history.

In The Young Master of Hyson Hall (Chatto & Windus) Mr. Frank R. Stockton has missed a great opportunity. In the first chapters we see an eccentric uncle running away from home and leaving his estate in the sole charge of his nephew Philip, a boy of fifteen. When we say that on the estate is a sunken wreck, and a swamp in which a deadly upas tree is believed to grow, and that Philip is at liberty to use Old Bruden, his uncle's double-barrelled gun, together with his uncle's horse, and that he has but to ask the neighbouring banker for money to get it, it will be seen what a joyous time is before him. Unfortunately, Mr. Stockton has chosen to develop his story on less interesting lines than we could have desired, and the book does not rank with his successes. For the character of Chap Webster, Philip's chum, we are, however, grateful; and boys unacquainted with the altitude to which Mr. Stockton can rise may find The Young Master of Hyson Hall quite good enough.

Another book for boys, by an author known favourably to older readers for his novel Mr. Passingham, is Cooper's First Term (Grant Richards), by Mr. Thomas Cobb. Cooper is a very real little boy, younger than the ordinary schoolboys are wont to be; but his age is as well worth writing about as theirs. Among other things this capital little tale comprises a really worthy pillow fight. From the same publisher comes a new edition of Helen's Babies, with illustrations by Miss Eva Roos. Mr. Habberton's story has gone into many forms since it first took England by storm in the seventies, but it has never been better printed than in this volume.

Mr. Hassall's work is also to be found in Primal Scenes (Lamley), by the Rev. H. N. Hutchinson, an attempt to do scientifically, though with no sacrifice of humour, what Mr. E. T. Reed did recklessly in his Pre-historic Peeps. This book should amuse children considerably, but we cannot away with the conviction that the idea is Mr. Reed's and the present work something of a "poach." Other "oblongs" include The Cat and the Mouse (Blackie), by Alice B. Woodward, an amusing version, in colour and monochrome, of a story excellently adapted to please little children; an Animal-Alphabet Book (Allen), by Sara W. M. Fallon, which would be more acceptable if it were in colour; and Wonderful Willie (Richards), a highly-coloured and dramatic American toy-book describing the exploits of two little boys, a gorilla, and a giraffe, in a successful campaign against the Spaniards.

Other New Books.

OUR RARER BRITISH BIRDS. BY RICHARD KEARTON, F.Z.S.

The brothers Kearton are doing a wonderful work with pen and camera. Their photographs and descriptions of British birds in their haunts are a new force in ornithology, indeed, we know of few books more calculated to awaken a love of birds, and desire to study them, than Messrs. Kearton's British Birds' Nests (1895) and this supplementary volume. Here Messrs. Kearton deal mainly with birds which, because of their rarity, they had not been able to photograph in their main volume. Typical birds of this class are the Great Crested Grebe, the Marsh Harrier, the Kite, the Lesser Redpoll, the Peregrine Falcon, the Bearded Tit, the White-tailed Eagle, and the Red-necked Phalarope. A feature of the volume is the authors' bitter declaration that the Wild Bird Protection laws are ineffective and even mischievous.

Eggs protected by law are still openly hunted for in broad light of day by children, young men and old men, maidens and white-haired dames; and, incredible as it may sound, even waited for hours together, morning after morning, until they are dropped into the nest by their layers. When the eggs of any species reach an attractively high figure in dealers' catalogues, it is a gloomy day for its slender band of representatives; but what shall we say of the prospects when a presumably rich collector deliberately places a premium upon its destruction, by giving 100 per cent. more than the recognised market price, which was all that he was asked for a clutch of eggs. The Wild Bird

Protection laws are very like a beautiful padlock and chain hanging useless on a widely-opened stable door which it is nobody's business to lock; and I have no hesitation in saying that the only real good done in the United Kingdom in the way of bird preservation has been accomplished by private effort.

The personal protection on the spot, not placards printed at Messrs. Eyre & Spottiswoode's, affords the best protection cannot be doubted; still we fancy that the laws do stem the tide of common bird-nesters. The arch-enemy is the country lad who takes eggs and destroys nests in the mere lust to destroy something that is beautiful and elaborate. Mr. Kearton says that "besides breaking eggs and doing helpless nestlings to death, some of them are guilty of the unspeakable cruelty of actually barring up birds sitting on their nests in hollow trees with stones, and consigning the faithful creatures to a living tomb." Mr. Kearton makes the excellent suggestion that school-boys should be provided with a really interesting and well illustrated reading-book devoted to British natural history, and that the older classes should be taken out once a month and put through field observations.

We should like to cull some of the facts and anecdotes with which this book abounds. It is interesting to learn, for instance, that the Peregrine Falcon is not killed off all grouse moors, but is "valued as a natural and useful weeder-out of weaklings and disease-stricken birds," and on that account is preserved in moderation. Similarly the Golden Eagle is welcomed on many Scottish deer forests because it preys on blue hares, which, if allowed to become numerous, are for ever giving warning to the deer of the sportsman's approach. It is interesting, too, to learn that the Great Crested Grebe has a haunt at Redhill, and that one pair brought off their young last summer in one of the lakes in Richmond Park. The discovery of a Marsh Harrier's and Montagu Harrier's nests in Norfolk is one of the triumphs of the book, the authors having waited years to hear of one. They travelled from London specially to photograph the nests, and easily did so, for, alas! they had just been robbed and the birds trapped. We hope that Messrs. Kearton will continue their unique work among British birds. (Cassell.)

THE ROMAN FESTIVALS. BY W. WARDE FOWLER.

Mr. Fowler has written a book with which every student of Roman religion will have to make his account. He approaches his subject from the side of cult rather than that of myth, and his method is to take the Fasti of the republican calendar, and to discuss the character and ritual of each feast in turn upon the basis of the very scanty information which is in many places available. A wide acquaintance alike with the texts, with the speculations of English and German archaeologists, and with the results of folk-lore, have enabled him to produce a commentary of the very highest value. Mr. Fowler is not himself very enthusiastic about what he has achieved.

The task has often been an ungrateful one—one, indeed, of Dipping buckets into empty wells

And growing old with drawing nothing up.

The more carefully I study any particular festival, the more (at least in many cases) I have been driven into doubt and difficulty, both as to reported facts and their interpretation.

Indeed, it is true that there are many problems of Roman religion still unsolved and, perhaps, insoluble. But alike as a storehouse of critically-sifted facts and as a tentative essay towards the synthetic arrangement of these facts, Mr. Fowler's book seems to us to mark a very distinct advance upon anything that has yet been done. It is curious to note that its publication synchronises with that of Emil Aust's Die Religion der Römer, and that Prof. Wissowa's Religion und Kultus der Römer may be almost immediately expected. This particular branch of religious history seems to be looking up. (Macmillan.)

Fiction.

Dartnell. By Benjamin Swift.
(Heinemann. 2s. 6d. net.)

A NOVEL, of course, may be anything one likes to make it, so that it was quite permissible for Mr. Swift to start from "a bizarre incident" (his sub-title), and with a man avowedly inhuman as his central figure. He is required, of course, to prove his case artistically. It is not enough to say: "If a book were ever written about him, no one would believe there could be such a man." This is the pathetic trick of a moment of imaginative exhaustion, and should have been relentlessly erased in the morning. Sir Charles Dartnell, we are told, "was neither moral nor immoral. He was neuter." That is not enough either; the man must be more consistent in his inconsistency, credible in his unnaturalness. Let us put Dartnell to the test of two essential lines of observation: (1) the question of taste—the gentleman. "He was the last of a refined and fastidious race, and he was going to be more fastidious than any of them." His refinement is insisted on again and again. Yet, under pretence of going abroad, he conceals himself in "the top flat" of his town house in order to watch his wife's guilty intrigue with Lord Odney! The thing is so inexpressibly silly that one smiles down a natural wish to punch the cad's head. (2) Dartnell is spiritual-minded. "Even human language, crowded as it is with carnal meanings, was inadequate to express the refinement of his thought." "He has studied all the passions, though he has none himself." Yet he sets his wife's maid to play the eavesdropper upon her, he is for ever chattering morbid rubbish about sex, and he "guesses" that he is afflicted with "the fury of Michael Angelo." Here we are on very strange ground—the abnormality of sex, which is rarely absent from supreme genius. Sir Charles Dartnell is not a genius; nor is Mr. Swift. He is a very clever writer; but he will never produce an enduring novel until he has learned to put more heart into his work. He may go on butting his brilliant head against human nature all his life, and will never so understand it. There is here no sign of that awed humility before the august mysteries of human frailty and human motive without which there can be no genuine insight and no reverence. Take a saying which indicates his present limitations: "Sex, hunger, and thirst," he assures us, "are the grim trinity which preside over the progress of mankind." They are nothing of the sort: the beasts experience them just as keenly as we do, and yet make no progress. Sir Charles Dartnell, in short, is a mere blurred monstrosity; and the other characters, if more comprehensible, make no abiding stay in the chambers of the imagination: they simply enter in at one door and hasten out at another. The book, nevertheless, is interesting, in its fugitive way, and it has a certain art—the art of an artistic temperament expressing itself at a rush. In intellectual brilliancy (which is really not one of the fundamentals of a good novel) this work is altogether inferior to Nancy Noon and The Destroyer. It is time, indeed, that Mr. Swift began to mend his ways. He has had a very patient hearing. He has fine qualities; and his literary instinct is so sure that, even in Dartnell, there is scarcely a misshapen phrase. But he must be told that in fiction there is a worse thing than commonplace writing, and that is insincerity of feeling, which is the unpardonable sin.

McTeague. By Frank Norris.
(Grant Richards. 6s.)

MR. NORRIS, aware of his strength, uses it brutally. McTeague is a narrative of lower middle-class life in San Francisco. The hero is a quack dentist, a great, coarse, simple-minded animal of a fellow, who marries an attractive girl of stingy and avaricious temperament. Trina possesses a fortune of five thousand dollars, won in a lottery, and though McTeague loses his livelihood by Government edict against unlicensed dentistry, she will not let him touch her capital. Together they descend, he growing more brutish, she more miserly. In the result he kills her for her five thousand dollars, and decamps. At the end of the book he commits another murder, and we leave him handcuffed to a corpse in the middle of a desert valley, where death certainly awaits him. The existence of nether San Francisco is described with grim and fearless vigour. No sordid detail is omitted, no revolting episode glossed over. We do not ask, if the subject is to be handled at all, that it should be trifled with, but we do ask that Mr. Norris's vision should comprise something beyond the gross animalism of humanity; we do ask for something of the spirit.

Let us add that Mr. Norris has a genuine imaginative talent. That was shown in his Shanghaied, a fine book that preceded McTeague.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

OUTSIDE THE RADIUS.

BY W. PETT RIDGE.

Mr. Ridge has here turned his searchlight of humour on the remoter suburbs. We have fourteen stories, all located in The Crescent, which is first described as a whole. "Many in The Crescent flatter themselves that they do not know the people next door, stating this with pride as though it made them worthy of the Victoria Cross; but their servants are acquainted, and this does just as well. Besides, there is Mrs. Lade." (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

THE SKY PILOT: A TALE OF THE FOOTHILLS.

BY RALPH CONNOR.

The old piquant blend of mining camp wickedness in the light of a "revival." The sky pilot makes an immediate impression, but has to be content at first with one Sunday a fortnight. Preaching Sunday alternated with Permit Sunday. "Hi put it rather graphically. The Devil takes his innin's one Sunday and the Pilot the next." (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

IN THE COILS OF THE SERPENT. BY MARGUERITE ROSSO.

Melodramatic nonsense about awful wickedness, mental control, and a host of unreal emotions. "His letter did not take him long to read, but its contents interested him so little that he threw it over to his brother without a word and instinctively his fingers wandered to the zither on the table, and, with caressing tenderness, he swept the strings, bringing forth echoes of the most exquisite music." (Drane. 6s.)

PAUL.

BY FLORENCE MORSE KINGSLEY.

In this story, by the author of Titus and Stephen, the chief events of St. Paul's life are followed and expanded. (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.)

THE SECRET OF MARK PEPYS.

BY FRED. J. PROCTOR.

Californian life in full key. There are half-castes, and senoritas, and stalwart redskins and guides, and a captive Indian girl. "Western pastoral life, with its gaiety, chivalry, and adventure." (Digby, Long & Co. 6s.)

We have also received A Torn-Out Page, by Dora Russell (Digby, Long & Co.), a story of love and blackmail; The Favour of Princes, by Mark Lee Luther (The Macmillan Co.), an historical novel of the time of Louis XV., opening with a description of the execution of Damiens; Tales of the Strong Room, by Frank Denison, horrors and mysteries of strong-rooms narrated by a strong-room expert; and Soldier Rigdale, by Beulah Mary Dix, a pleasant tale of old Puritan Mayflower days (The Macmillan Co. 6s.).

The World of Dickens.

IN honour of its "Memorial Edition of Charles Dickens," the Daily News Weekly has lately offered to the world a competitive examination in that author's work, and the results were published on Saturday last. The competition is interesting if only because by a hundred pin-pricks of suggestion, and provocations of memory, it sends us back to our Dickens to learn how little we know of that fantastic world of which he was the creator.

The questions were twenty-five in number, modelled, of course, upon Calverley's famous Pickwick examination paper. Here is one:

Show the connexion between poultry and elephants which, strange as it may seem, is made plain in one of the novels.

The reference is to Dombey and Son. The Game Chicken remonstrates with Mr. Toots for his poor spirit in refraining from "blowing on this here match [of Florence and Walter] to the Stiff 'un."

"My sentiments is Game and Fancy, Master," returned the Chicken. "That's wot my sentiments is. I can't abear a meanness. I'm afore the public. I'm to be heard of at the bar o' the Little Helephant, and no governor o' mine musn't go and do what's mean."

This is almost too ingenious. Again, the demand for a parallel to "There's a young 'oman on the next form but two as has drunk nine breakfast cups and a half, and she is swelling wisely before my eyes," is not too well fulfilled in the reference to Dora's housekeeping, given in David Copperfield's words:

"But I apprehend that we were personally unfortunate in engaging a servant with a taste for cordials, who swelled our account for porter at the public-house by such inexplicable items as 'quartern rum shrub (Mrs. C.),' 'half-quartern gin and cloves (Mrs. C.),' 'glass rum and peppermint (Mrs. C.),' the parentheses always referring to Dora, who was supposed, it appeared on explanation, to have imbibed the whole of these refreshments."

An admirable answer has been furnished in response to the question asking for an example of Dickens's portraiture of the power of love:

"I pledge you my professional word I didn't even know she could dance till her last benefit, and then she played Juliet, and Helen Macgregor, and did the skipping-rope horopipe between the pieces. The very first time I saw that admirable woman, Johnson," said Mr. Crummles, drawing a little nearer, and speaking in a tone of confidential friendship, "she stood upon her head on the butt-end of a spear, surrounded with blazing fireworks."

"You astonish me!" said Nicholas.

"She astonished me!" returned Mr. Crummles, with a very serious countenance. "Such grace, coupled with such dignity, I adored her from that moment!"

This is, of course, from Actor-manager Crummles' eulogy of his distinguished spouse, in Nicholas Nickleby. Other examples occur to everyone. Think of John Chivery Junior as his mother pointed him out to Clennam, while he sat amid the flapping linen in the back-yard:

"It's the only change he takes," said Mrs. Chivery. . . . "He won't go out even in the back-yard when there's no linen; but when there's linen to keep the neighbours' eyes off, he'll sit there hours. Hours he will. Says he feels as if it was groves!"

Or again of Mr. Venus, the anatomical artist, from whom, in consequence of the letter in which his adored one spurned his offer, and declared that she did not desire "to regard herself nor yet to be regarded in that bony light" . . . "all was fled save gall."

"My very bones [he confided to the other friendly-mover] is rendered flabby by brooding over it. If they could be brought to me loose to sort, I should hardly have the face to claim 'em as mine. To such an extent have I fallen off under it."

The young lady, by the way, was Miss Pleasant Riderhood; and here is a proper place to point out an error into which, in a certain "Frame of Mind," has fallen so Dickens-saturated a reader as Mr. A. B. Walkley. It is in his essay on Mme. Sarah Bernhardt that he uses the verb "to poll-parrot" as a synonym of "to imitate." Now a reference to Our Mutual Friend—and, especially to the account of a colloquy between John Harmon (disguised), Rogue Riderhood, and his daughter—will establish the true use of the word as the equivalent of "to chatter," or prattle.

"Why the devil don't you answer the Captain? You can Poll Parrot enough when you ain't wanted to Poll Parrot, you perverse jade!"

Bleak House also furnishes an example of one of Dickens's rare slips from accuracy. Three are given in answer to Question XIII.; one is from David Copperfield, and Pickwick furnishes two. To these we may add (unless it is to be counted to the credit of young Mr. Smallweed's financial talents) that his adroit totalling of the score upon the occasion of his dining with the young man of the name of Guppy and Mr. Jobling was inaccurate. It ran:

"Four veals and hams is three, and four potatoes is three and four, and one summer-cabbage is three and six, and three marrows is four and six, and four half-pints of half-and-half is six and three, and four small rums is eight and three, and three Pollys is eight and six. Eight and six in half a sovereign, Polly, and eighteenpence out."

A reference to a preceding page shows that three pint-pots had been superadded.

Question X. is:

What lady was it who said that "if the police greased their whiskers less and minded the duties they were so heavy paid for a little more no one needn't be drove mad by scrouding so," and what was the cause of this outburst against the force?

The interpolated s will probably put most people on the track. It is, of course, the immortal Gamp.

"What a very ill-natured person you must be!" said Tom (as she hooked him with the handle of her umbrella).

Mrs. Gamp cried out fiercely: "Where's the pelisse?"—meaning the constabulary—and went on to say, shaking the handle of the umbrella at Tom, that "but for them fellers never being in the way when they were wanted, she'd have given him in charge, she would."

"If they greased their whiskers less, and minded the duties which they're paid so heavy for a little more," she observed, "no one needn't be drove mad by scrouding so!"

The removal of the lion from Northumberland House to the neighbourhood of Kew Gardens is of happy omen in connexion with a passage from the Sketches by Boz:

Miss Teresa Malderton was a very little girl, rather fat, with vermilion cheeks, but good-humoured, and still disengaged. . . . In vain had she flirted for ten years; in vain had Mr. and Mrs. Malderton assiduously kept up an extensive acquaintance among the young eligible bachelors of Camberwell, and even of those of Wandsworth and Brixton; to say nothing of those who "dropped in" from town. Miss Malderton was as well known as the lion on the top of Northumberland House, and had an equal chance of "going off."

And, in relation to the changes which time has made in the aspect of London since Dickens's days, the projected thoroughfare from Holborn to the Strand would surely have formed a better bait to draw a reminiscence of Dick Swiveller than a cumbrous reference to the mimicry which, according to biologists, is one of the determinants of the evolutionary process:

I enter in this little book [said Dick] the names of the streets that I can't go down while the shops are open. This dinner to-day closes Long Acre. I bought a pair of boots in Great Queen-street last week, and made that no thoroughfare too. There's only one avenue to the Strand left open now, and I shall have to stop that up to-night with a pair of gloves. The roads are closing so fast in every direction that in about a month's time, unless my aunt sends me a remittance, I shall have to go three or four miles out of town to get over the way.

Obviously, Avenue Kruger—or whatever is to be its name—would have fulfilled what an Irish journalist was accustomed to call “a much-needed want.”

One is glad to see brought to the light Mrs. Skewton's appreciation of the eighth Henry:

So bluff! [cried Mrs. Skewton], wasn't he? So burly. So truly English. Such a picture, too, he makes, with his dear little peepy eyes and his benevolent chin!

With which you may compare a thumb-nail résumé of another sovereign. Was it not Lady Tippins's husband who had been knighted by George III. in mistake for somebody else?—“on which occasion His Majesty was graciously pleased to observe: ‘What, what, what? Who, who, who? Why, why, why?’”

Things Seen.

The Ways of War.

THEY tell me the altar was draped in black, that under the dome were soldiers, and that the full band of the Coldstream Guards was stationed in front of the choir.

They tell me—but this is what I saw in St. Paul's Cathedral on Tuesday afternoon at the Memorial Service for those who have fallen in the war.

The fog hung over the city. The churchyard was thronged. The steps of the Cathedral were hidden by a dense, black mass, moving up, up. I joined them and slowly was carried in. Then—what did I see? Choir, band, preacher, silent, seated congregation? No! I saw only the great dim north aisle, stretching before me like some vast avenue. The time-stained pillars streamed upwards into dimness, the fog and the gathering darkness mingled, illumined here and there by a bare jet of flaring gas. To the left hung the tattered colours of some who fell in the Crimea, and through the fog loomed their mute monument. In the aisle, the public, all in black, were wedged together, motionless, absorbed, fading beyond into the fog. All stood silent, listening. I had expected to hear Chopin's “Marche Funèbre,” but it so happened that when I entered, the Cathedral echoed to the sad melody of a simple hymn that carried back and touched old chords. “Brief life is here our portion” sang the choir, and as the verses slowly followed one another, rising mysteriously from lips we could not see, one by one citizens took up the refrain, each singing it quietly to himself, each with his own thoughts, for we were mourners. The effect was almost unbearable, and many stole away. As I went down the steps two soldiers were passing by. Each carried an outfit parcel. Their brown puttee-swathed legs peeped from beneath their long cloaks, and lower gleamed their spurs. So it was. There, in the Cathedral, Grief and the Past; here, in the street, Grit and the Future—the ways of War.

The Eclipse.

IT was a quarter-to-eleven last Saturday night when I climbed upon the tram-car at Kew to sail into London. I say sail, because it was with a sense of sailing that I travelled along the great highway through suburb after suburb under the moon. The tram bounded along with a kind of cantering energy that was delightful. But the cold began to assault me with cold stabs and colder embraces. I laughed. Thus do the North Sea pilots suffer at the helm; and for “the lit sea's unquiet way” I had the long rows of lights converging into the gloom of London. The wind, which was bitter in Gunnersbury, had become savage at Chiswick, and as we raced into Hammersmith it seemed vindictive. I changed, at the Broadway, to a red Hammersmith 'bus, and began the second long stage. A young woman was the only other occupant of a garden seat. She sat blue and unmoved. I looked at her and reflected that if she, the weaker vessel—then I screamed under my breath as the cold grasped my thighs. At the Albert Memorial my agony expelled a thin wonder: Will the moon or the young woman disappear first? As we rolled up the slope from Albert Gate they were both in my eye, but the cold pierced me like a bayonet.

A blush warmed my cheeks; I accepted my shame, arose, and descended to an inside seat. Later, as I rushed across Piccadilly Circus I turned and saw the young woman riding on to King's Cross, and the first coppery tinge of the earth's shadow on the moon.

Memoirs of the Moment.

BERNARD QUARITCH was not a king of booksellers alone. His mind to him a kingdom was as well as his shop. He had a great business, but he had also all his desires. He wished for no glory or profit other than he got. There are stories of Disraelian speeches of his when he left Bohn, whom he addressed as the head bookseller of London, whereas he himself was to become the head bookseller of the world. Well, he got just what he wanted—a place in Piccadilly, a banker's account which enabled him to write out a cheque for over £30,000 at a single sale, a reputation among his fellows for shrewdness, and their homage to him as a salesman who never—hardly ever—abated a price, not even the price of an Australian volume to Mr. Henniker Heaton. If there were other worlds to conquer, Bernard Quaritch knew them not. Daily he went down on his omnibus from his north-western suburb, and that was when most people were still at breakfast. In the evening he returned by the same vehicle, a volume under his arm as often as not—some new prize that he liked to look at in leisure. All the long day he was about in the shop, accessible to the humblest customer who had any need of his knowledge and skill.

THE real enthusiast has no recreations outside his own overmastering passion or hobby. The man who is keen at his profession and keen also at a game is usually playing—however lightly or solemnly—at both. White-headed Bernard Quaritch, therefore, was booky even in his amusements. He founded the dining club, “Ye Sette of Odde Volumes”—and the affectation of the name shall be forgiven to a Slav by descent, born in Saxony, and only naturalised in England—his talk was all of books; consequently he was bored by an ordinary club dinner. Lord Tennyson was once found—almost to his own surprise—with the Odde Volumes, and had a chance of talking Fitzgerald to the man who published the first translation of Omar Khayyám in this country; and among the customers at the shop in Piccadilly was, of course, Mr. Gladstone, and even he forebore to bargain with the Prime Minister of Booksellers. Though he bore his four-score years lightly, and had been at his shop until almost the day he died, Bernard Quaritch had not faced the fatigues of the sale-room for several seasons, one of the Ashburnham sales being the last at which he appeared. "Quaritch" was still sung out as a purchaser: but, when you turned to see the veteran, it was not he. How far such a business is "a one-man business" time must show; but the traditions of its founder may well survive in the place which was, fifty years ago, his own almost single-handed creation.

THE name of the Earl of Tankerville at once recalls the Chillingham bulls—that famous breed which still endures in his Northumberland home, and which has given sport to princes. An Earl of Tankerville, as owner of the bulls, has to be a sportsman, and if the name of the peer whose death is reported this week has rather dropped out of memory in this connexion, one has only to remember that he was born ninety years ago. For fifty years he has held the title; he married, nearly half a century ago, Lady Olivia Montagu, eldest daughter of the sixth Duke of Manchester, and his heir, hitherto known as Lord Bennet, a traveller, an observer, and a wit, is now fifty-seven years of age. From the late Earl's mother, whose Christian name was Corisande, a statesman-novelist borrowed the entitling of his penultimate heroine. There was a great deal, besides, in the history of the Bennets to fascinate a romancer. The family began its greatness with a Bennet who was a commissioner for the suppression of heresy in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. It is quite natural to add that his descendant, the new Earl, by way of reaction from this ancestral rôle, joined the Roman Catholic Church in the reign of Queen Victoria. He is, moreover, a judge of the arts, and he writes as neat a couplet at need as the amateur could desire.

THE late Earl himself, though best at his gun, was by no means incapable with his pen, as he proved when he contributed, some years ago, a series of reminiscences to the Field. In the Highlands he met Landseer, who had the right to be stalking over the same ground, but whom he mistook for a poacher—"a little strongly-built man, very like a Pocket Hercules or Puck." Lord Tankerville came upon him unawares, as he was grallocking his deer. "This he did with quietness and dexterity, not forgetting to work in the burn, the tallow, and other treasures. He next let the head hang over so as to display the horns, and then, equating down on a stone opposite, took out of his pocket what I thought would be his pipe or whisky-flask"—as well it might have been. But it was a sketchbook. Lord Tankerville abstained from grallocking his human quarry, but came boldly into the open and so found himself face to face with his friend of many years to come—Landseer.

MME. DE FALBE died this week at Bournemouth, not at her house in Grosvenor-square, nor at Luton Hoo—the two houses which will long be associated with her brilliant hospitalities. Mme. de Falbe and Frances, Countess of Waldegrave were often named together, not only as successful entertainers in town and out of it, but as women whose marriages had been such successes that they were willing to repeat the experiment a second and a third time. Mme. de Falbe's case differed somewhat, inasmuch as she outlived her third husband and accepted widowhood as a fixed state. The daughter of Mr. Thomas Hawkes, belonging to a bygone generation of members of Parliament, she was very young as well as very much admired when, some sixty years ago, she married Mr. Ward, an uncle of the present Earl of Dudley. With her second husband, Mr. Gerard Leigh, she became that very delightful thing, the life tenant of Luton Hoo—a delight she was able to share with her third husband, M. de Falbe, formerly Danish Minister at the Court of St. James. One of the saddest memories of her later life was that of the death of the Duke of Clarence, whose engagement to the Princess May had been finally fixed under her favourable roof.

GENERAL WAUCHOPE owed some of his inspirations to his name—which used to be printed as pronounced, "Walk-up"—at the time of the amazing increase of his poll in Midlothian, when he championed the Unionist cause against Mr. Gladstone. The name carries its own incongruous sadness now that the hero who bore it lies buried in South Africa: a man, not of valour merely, but of parts. Four times he had been wounded on other battle-fields, three times seriously, so that his friends had got a sort of confidence that he was fated to live and not to die. That was not his own faith, however. He had a foreboding when he left his Midlothian home that he left it for the last time; and one wonders what he thought when two warning bullets hit his helmet before a third came home and deprived him of all thought at all.

Correspondence.

Our "Gifted Correspondent."

SIR,—As I am the person referred to as a "professional Navy League lecturer" by your anonymous correspondent at Rottingdean, in his comment, published in your issue of the 16th inst., upon a brief address given by Mr. Rudyard Kipling at a Navy League meeting held at that village on the 24th of last month, I should like to be kindly allowed space for a very few observations.

Of these, the first is that, in a fairly wide experience of reporters' efforts, I have never seen a description so ludicrously at variance with fact as is your correspondent's account of Mr. Kipling's demeanour on the occasion in question. Even that exquisite literary figure, that Mr. Kipling "blushed like a great kid," has its justification wholly and solely in your correspondent's mysterious inner consciousness. Your Little England member of the audience is wrong in saying that Mr. Kipling was pale, wrong in saying that he appeared nervous, wrong in saying that he spoke at a terrific rate. As for his early departure, the necessity for this had been previously explained to those concerned.

With your correspondent's estimate of my own lecture I have not the least quarrel, but if his appreciation, or depreciation, of my own humble efforts be not more correct than his account of Mr. Kipling's behaviour, I confess to a haunting doubt as to whether it is worth much.

I do not quite know, by the way, what your anonymous friend means by applying the epithet "professional" to his description of myself. If he means to imply that lecturing is my sole vocation, he is wrong again, as I happen to be an individual actively occupied with my own private affairs. If he merely wishes to convey that I was paid for the task which I had the privilege to fulfil at Rottingdean, and which was to me veritably a labour of love, he is once more in error.

I fear, however, that I am, after all, doing your gifted correspondent an injustice, as I have a deep inward conviction that his real purpose in writing to you was to ascertain how many mistakes, misstatements, and mis-descriptions he could get into twenty-six lines.—I am, &c.,

H. F. WYATT.

United University Club, Pall Mall.

[We regret that our correspondent should have called Mr. Wyatt a professional lecturer. Mr. Wyatt clearly is no more a professional than our correspondent is a Little Englander. We have entire confidence in our correspondent's judgment and observation.]

Prince Otto.

SIR,—Plainly, your correspondent, F. W. Place, has not read Stevenson's letters very closely yet, or he could never suppose that Prince Otto was not quite earnestly written. I quote two passages :

My brief romance, Prince Otto—far my most difficult adventure up to now—is near an end. . . . I do not know if I have made a spoon or only spoiled a horn; but I am tempted to hope the first. . . . There is a good deal of stuff in it, both dramatic and, I think, poetic; and the story is not like these purposeless fables of to-day, but is, at least, intended to stand firm on a base of philosophy—or morals—as you please. It has been long gestated, and is wrought with care. (To W. H. Low, December 1883.)

For me it is my chief o' works; hence probably not so for others, since it only means that I have here attacked the greatest difficulties. But some chapters towards the end—three in particular—I do think come off. I find them stirring, dramatic, and not unpoetical. We shall see, however; as like as not the effort will be more obvious than the success. For of course I strung myself hard to carry it out. (To Sidney Colvin, March 1884.)

These quotations may not present Stevenson's dispassionate judgment of the book. They are, it seems to me, ample proof that he wrote it in the most serious earnest. He acknowledges, however (letter to C. W. Stoddard, February 1886), "a giddy-mindedness which spoils the book, and often gives it a wanton air of unreality"; and he puts it down to "the difficulty of being ideal in an age of realism." It must be this "giddy-mindedness" which disappoints Mr. Cornford, and stirs distrust in Mr. Andrew Lang and your correspondent. For my part, I am with your other correspondent "C." I like Prince Otto best of all Stevenson's tales; and I love the streak of fantasy that makes it so absolutely his own.

If Mr. Cornford had had the right feeling for the book he could never, I think, have dragged the dawn in the forest from its context to exhibit it "highly commended" as a piece of romantic description.—I am, &c., Q.

The fact that the "country debating club" consists of "ardent politicians" greatly in need of information has, of course, influenced the foregoing selection.

Prize Competition No. 14 (New Series).

We offer a prize of one guinea this week for the best translation, in similar length, metre, and rhyming scheme, of this poem by Alfred De Musset :

Mes chers amis, quand je mourrai,
Plantez un saule au cimetière :
J'aime son feuillage éploré,
La pâleur m'en est douce et chère,
Et son ombre sera légère
A la terre où je dormirai.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43 Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, December 27. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the first column of p. 752 or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers.

NOTICE.

Particulars of the Special Prize Competitions, which the ACADEMY is adding to the ordinary weekly competitions, will be found on the inside of the cover.

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

THE UNITED KINGDOM: A POLITICAL HISTORY.

BY GOLDWIN SMITH.

We have had war-histories of the United Kingdom, people-histories, constitutional-histories, and social-histories. Mr. Goldwin Smith has endeavoured to supply the obvious need for a good political history of the country. Having stated his aim very briefly and simply, the author proceeds to take the reader in regular progression from the Conquest down to recent times. (Macmillan. 2 vols. 15s. net.)

THE FRANCO-GERMAN WAR, 1870-71.

BY GENERALS AND OTHER OFFICERS.

For a long time the only exhaustive German account of the great struggle of 1870-71 has been the Official History, a work of enormous bulk, and necessarily written in a highly technical way. There came a demand in Germany for a work combining weighty historic treatment with literary grace. Out of this need grew this book, which is the combined work of the best German military writers. Major-General J. F. Maurice is mainly responsible for the translation. The German illustrations have been transferred, and the book forms an imposing quarto volume. (Sonnenschein.)

LESSONS OF THE WAR WITH SPAIN. BY ALFRED T. MAHAN.

This is a series of papers which have appeared in various magazines, written to elicit the lessons of the war between the United States and Spain. Into them the author has interwoven reflections on warfare in general. "A consecutive narrative, utilised as a medium for illustrating the principles of war," is the author's description of his book. The Spanish-American war has the special value of illustrating the relations and mutual helpfulness of the army and navy in war. (Sampson Low.)

GEORGE BUCHANAN.

BY DR. ROBERT WALLACE.

The late Dr. Wallace was engaged on this biography at the time of his sudden and much lamented death in the House of Commons. It has fallen to Mr. J. Campbell Smith to write the last chapter of the book. As now completed the book forms a "brief popular presentation" of the "Father of Liberalism." Poet, wit, controversialist, scholiast—Buchanan well deserves wider study. His connexion with Mary Queen of Scots, John Knox, and James I. gives lasting importance to his career. (Olipphant. 1s. 6d.)

JAMES HACK TUKE.

COMPILED BY THE RIGHT HON. SIR EDWARD FRY.

James Hack Tuke, the well-known Quaker banker, of Hitchin, who took such a prominent part in investigating and alleviating distress in Ireland in the last decade, is the subject of this memoir. Mr. Tuke was not only a man of wide human sympathies, he was also a man of great culture, and a mighty collector of old china. Mr. Tuke was a statesman without office, and this record of his activities will be highly valued by many. Sir Edward Fry, himself a member of the Society of Friends, brings to his task a modest and discerning pen. (Macmillan.)

MEMORIALS OF HUGH M. MATHESON.

BY THE REV. J. OSWALD DYKES.

This biography is pre-eminently interesting to Presbyterians, as the last-named is to Friends. It is the record of a life of well-applied wealth, earnest churchmanship, and, in particular, of great activity in the direction of missionary effort in China. A Scotchman of good family, Mr. Matheson removed to London, and it was his desire to revive the ancient Puritan Presbyterianism which England has so largely lost. Mr. Matheson was a great lay ecclesiastic, and this record of his life arrives within two years of his death. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

"TEMPLE CLASSICS."

EDITED BY ISRAEL GOLLANCZ.

To this series, which will soon be as long as Wimpole-street, are added three volumes—In Memoriam, the Ramayana, and the Paradiso of Dante. The last-named volume contains the Italian text and a new literal translation printed on opposite pages, with copious notes. (J. M. Dent. Each 1s. 6d. net.)

The Origin and Growth of the English Constitution.

AN HISTORICAL TREATISE.

In which is drawn out, by the light of the most recent researches, the gradual development of the English constitutional system, and the growth out of that system of the Federal Republic of the United States.

By HANNIS TAYLOR, LL.D.,

LATE MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY OF THE UNITED STATES TO SPAIN.

In Two Octavo Volumes, the Set 36s. Sixth Edition, Vol. I.; First Edition, Vol. II.

Formally adopted as a Text Book by the University of Dublin. In Use at the Universities of Oxford and Edinburgh. Adopted either as a Text Book or Book of Reference by many of the leading American Universities and Law Schools.

"The completion of the second volume rounds out one of the most important recent achievements of American scholarship."

Review of Reviews, November, 1899.

"The freshness and originality of his views, and the air of impartiality and tolerance which is conspicuous in his writing, may be attributed to the 'semi-detached' position which, as an American, he is able to take up.....The account of the jury is the best to be found anywhere."

English Historical Review, October, 1899.

"I may congratulate you on the production of a piece of sound, thorough, interesting work."

RT. REV. WILLIAM STUBBS,

Lord Bishop of Oxford.

"I congratulate you on having finished so great a task, and given the most valuable illustration of the unity of history in tracing the principles of the Constitution from its early beginnings in the England of the seventh and eighth centuries to its latest developments in the United States as well as in England. I trust that it may take an important place in historical and constitutional teaching in our Universities."

RT. HON. JAMES Bryce,

Author of "The American Commonwealth."

"I have already read a good deal, here and there, in your monumental work. Your plan of treating the constitutional history of England and the United States as a connected whole strikes me as particularly happy. The book must be the outcome of enormous research."

THOMAS E. HOLLAND, D.C.L.,

Chichele Professor of International Law and Diplomacy, University of Oxford.

"No other book exhibits so clear a view of the English Constitution 'broadening down from precedent to precedent.'"

MONTAGU BURROWS,

Chichele Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford.

"The work is, in my judgment, a masterly, philosophical, and exhaustive treatment of the most important chapter of political history which the world has ever seen or is likely to see."

EDWARD J. PHILIPS,

Late United States Minister to England.

"The work gives every promise of becoming recognised as an authoritative summary of the entire evolution of Anglo-American constitutional liberty and government."—New York Law Journal.

By JOHN BROADHURST NICHOLS.

Crown 8vo, 6s., cloth boards.

To this volume was awarded the £100 Prize offered a year ago by the RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY for the best exposition of Evangelical Belief as opposed to Sacerdotalism. The treatment of this great theme is aggressive in the best sense. It does not merely attack the errors and evils of Romanism and Ritualism; it shows that to any one who intelligently and loyally accepts the teaching of the New Testament Sacerdotalism is impossible.

The Literary Week.

It is a safe prediction that the year 1900 will be a year of war-books. Not in recent times have the features of any war so played into the hands of the war-author as distinct from the war-journalist. The strict, though always wise, censorship which has been imposed on news from South Africa will act like a dam; when the war is over there will be a rush of diaries and histories—comparable to the Tugela in flood.

MR. JOHN MORLEY's study of Cromwell in the Century Magazine is to have a companion in a study of Cromwell which will appear in Scribner's. The author of the Scribner's article is Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, one of the heroes of the Cuban War. Thus the work, says the advertisement, "will show a man of action in history as viewed by a younger man of action to-day." Mr. Morley is certainly put at a disadvantage in never having commanded a regiment of Rough Riders, but he may have compensating qualities.

A REVIEW of David Harum from Mrs. Craigie's pen will appear in the North American Review for January.

WE are sorry that Mr. Stevens, who has been pent in Ladysmith for many weeks, has been ill. By this time we trust he is himself again.

THE Garden, the excellent weekly paper devoted to garden, orchard, and woodland, which Mr. Robinson (author of the English Flower Garden) founded nearly thirty years ago, is, after this week, to be edited by Miss Gertrude Jekyll and Mr. E. T. Cook, late of Gardening Illustrated. Miss Jekyll is, of course, the author of Wood and Garden.

NEXT to the Westminster Gazette's witty and consoling epitaph on the soldiers imprisoned at Pretoria—

Not lost, but gone before—the best humorous remark concerning the war is recorded in the Birmingham Daily Mail. It illustrates very richly the confidence a wife may have in her husband. A Reservist's wife, on being observed to look peculiarly thoughtful, was comforted for her loss. "Oh, it ain't 'im I'm troubling about," she is reported to have said. "It's them pore Boers. Bill's such a terror when he starts." Another Birmingham soldier is said to have thrown aside his rifle in the midst of a fray with the remark: "Here, Bill, you take my rifle. Just give me that brick-end, it'll be more homelike."

MR. LE GALLIENNE's war poem in the Chronicle asks in the beginning rather too much of all but hyper-sentimental and sensitive readers. The poet, addressing little children, cries:

Be happy, children, softly, for a woe
Is on us, a great woe for little fame.
Ah! in the old woods leave the mistletoe,
And leave the holly for another year,
Its berries are too red.

This, of course, is too much: the colour red plays too great a part in everyday life. Mr. Le Gallienne might as rightly say:

Ah! leave Miss Cholmondeley for another year,
Her Pottage is too red.

But once this affectation is overlooked the poem is a very kindly one, with a note of pity and gentleness which has long been absent from warlike verse.

MR. THOMAS HARDY contributed the following poem to the Westminster Gazette:

A CHRISTMAS GHOST-STORY.

South of the Line, inland from far Durban,
There lies—be he or not your countryman—
A fellow-mortal. Riddled are his bones,
But 'mid the breeze his puzzled phantom moans
Nightly to clear Canopus—fain to know
By whom, and when, the All-Earth-Gladdening Law
Of Peace, brought in by Some-One crucified,
Was ruled to be inept, and set aside?

THE Chronicle demurred to the character of the phantom in this poem, as exhibiting less of the quality of physical courage, and more bitterness and repining, than is associated with soldiers, and this drew from Mr. Hardy a very interesting letter. We quote a portion of it:

One's modern fancy of a disembodied spirit—unless intentionally humorous—is that of an entity which has passed into a tenuous, impartial, sexless, fitful form of existence, to which bodily courage is a contradiction in terms. Having no physical frame to defend or sacrifice, how can he show either courage or fear? His views are no longer local; nations are all one to him; his country is not bounded by seas, but is co-extensive with the globe itself, if it does not even include all the inhabited planets of the sky. He has put off the substance, and has put on, in part at any rate, the essence of the Universal.

If we go back to the ancient fancy on this subject, and look into the works of great imaginative writers, they seem to construct their soldier-shades much on the same principle—often with a stronger infusion of emotion, and less of sturdiness. The Homeric ghost of Patroclus was plaintively anxious about his funeral rites, and Virgil's military hosts—though some of them certainly were cheerful, and eager for war news—were as a body tremulous and pensive. The prophet Samuel, a man of great will and energy when on earth, was "disquieted" and obviously apprehensive when he was raised by the Witch of Endor at the request of Saul. Moreover, the authors of these Latin, Greek, and Hebrew fantasies were ignorant of the teaching of Christmas Day, that which alone moved the humble Natal shade to speak at all.

In Christian times Dante makes the chief Farinata exhibit a fine scornfulness, but even his Cæsar, Hector, Æneas, Saladin, and heroes of that stamp, have, if I am not mistaken, an aspect neither sad nor joyful, and only reach the level of serenity. Hamlet's father, impliedly martial in life, was not particularly brave as a spectre. In short, and speaking generally, these creatures of the imagination are uncertain, fleeting, and quivering, like winds, mists, gossamer-webs, and fallen autumn leaves; they are sad, pensive, and frequently feel more or less sorrow for the acts of their corporeal years

ANOTHER good poem growing from the war has been printed during the week. It will be harder to swallow than readers of war poetry like; but it is right. The author hides under the initials "H. H. F." This is the poem:

CONFESSIOAL.

Lord God, whom we besought so late,
Thou wouldst not suffer us forget
Thy Name and our weak human state—
Have patience, Lord, a little yet.

To-day no pomp of empire fills
The wintry land: amazed and awed
We watch Thy slowly-grinding Mills
Mete out to us our just reward.

To-day, by foemen sore beset,
Dismayed we draw our destined Lot.
We prayed to Thee "Lest we forget,"
And, even as we prayed, forgot.

With foolish, rash, vainglorious words
And sorry self-sufficiency
We boasted, girding on our swords,
As those who laid their armour by.

Wherefore the curse upon us lies
Of warriors all unready found,
Of braggarts blinded to despise
Their foe before the trumpets sound.

Humbly we call upon Thy Name,
Ere sounds once more the grim assault,
We do confess, O Lord, with shame
Our fault, our very grievous fault.

Give back our fathers' stern disdain
Of idle brag and empty boast,
So shall we stand erect again
And face unmoved the hostile host.

In the history of Children's Books the name of Mary Elizabeth Southwell Leathley, who died at Hastings, December 22, fills an honourable place. She was the daughter of George Dudley, of Clonmel. A Quaker by birth, she was received into the Roman Catholic Church in 1847 by Father Brownvill, S.J., of Hill-street, afterwards of Farm-street. She married, in the same year, Mr. William Henry Leathley, Barrister-at-Law, Inner Temple. Of the hundred and more children's books which Mrs. Leathley wrote the best known is Chickweed without Chickweed, which reached a sale of over half a million. Other popular books by her are Children of Scripture and Mama's Bible Stories.

THE following personal statement is made by Mr. Andrew Lang in his "Sign of the Ship," in Longman's for January:

When American humorists come to St. Andrews they generally ask people to point out to them the person of the present writer. Why they do this I cannot guess, but perhaps it is because they have seen my name in a newspaper. There are, however, local humorists who pick out any sufficiently eccentric-looking ancient, and say to the American inquirer: "That's him!" Then the American describes in his country's press the unconscious victim as me, with all his natural tact and wit. Next the English golfing press copies. That is why I read in some golf paper or other that I play golf "with a white ball in winter and a black ball in summer," and lunch publicly on scones which are carried round by my caddie. As I have not played golf for years, never carry scones or eat them in public, and, of all things, never played with a black ball, I conceive that someone has hoaxed the inquiring American. However, if his fables add to the gaiety of nations (which must be as easily amused as the friends of Mr. Peter Magnus), nobody is a penny the worse.

We find ourselves to have been sharing in the misapprehension of America concerning Mr. Lang. It was certainly our belief that golf had few more assiduous votaries (to use the kind of phrase that Mr. Lang most dislikes). His disclaimer is disturbing, especially as in Who's Who we find Mr. Lang himself giving his recreations as "cricket, golf, fishing." A recreation in which one has not indulged for years is a poor thing. Cricket, we suppose, is done with too; but fishing? Surely Mr. Lang still fishes; or is that another vulgar error?

MR. OLIVER HERFORD, who, though English, is fast winning a place as an American humorist, has another picture-book this year (in addition to his Primer of Natural History, which Mr. Lane publishes here), but it has not yet reached these shores. From a notice of this work, An Alphabet of Celebrities, in an American paper, we learn that it contains, among others, these couplets:

"I is for Ibsen reciting a play, While Irving and Ingersoll hasten away";

and

"K is the Kaiser, who kindly repeats
Some original verses to Kipling and Kests"; to which appropriate pictures are, of course, supplied.

MR. GERALD R. MILLS writes: "On p. 751 of this week's ACADEMY you say, speaking of the Temple Classics, 'To this series, which will soon be as long as Wimpole-street, are added . . . ' Might I ask why Wimpole-street? The expression does not seem familiar." Our correspondent might have assumed that Wimpole-street has length, and have been satisfied. But to enlighten him further, we may refer to the traditional report of the dying words of Swift: "All things come to an end—even Upper Wimpole-street."

THE writer of the "Conferences on Books and Men" in Cornhill has this month some ingenious chaff of Mr. Gosse's method of "reducing poems by imaginative insight to the passionate events out of which they originally sprang," as exemplified in the Life of Donne. After complimenting Mr. Gosse on his skill, "Urbanus Sylvan" proceeds mischievously to apply the same method to the poems of Browning:

The first thing to strike a new critic in the search for biographical material is Mr. Browning's curious penchant for duchesses, which is every bit as remarkable as Donne's for countesses, only Browning's were not, of course, English duchesses, who are rare birds, but the more widely spread Italian species. One of them, a Ferrarese lady, is described as his last duchess, implying therefore at least two predecessors, one of whom was probably the duchess that ran away from the effeminate duke with a gipsy woman; who is thus seen to have been in league with Browning, if not, as I suspect, Browning himself in disguise. From a poem called "Love among the Ruins," it would appear that they had found a very safe and picturesque trysting-place. It is, however, neither of these but the first duchess of all who, I confess, attracts me most. Her story is contained in the poem called "In a Gondola!" She was a Venetian lady, whose brothers for some reason had a spite against Mr. Browning, and hired bravos to stab him—happily, as we know, without permanent effect. The poem is interesting, apart from its main story, for a stanza which throws a side-light upon the poem of Holy Cross Day:

What are we two!
I am a Jew
And carry thee farther than friends can pursue,
To a feast of our tribe.

To return once more to the last duchess, whom Mr. Browning seems to have got rid of with a suddenness that would have attracted more attention in England, I cannot make up my mind if she is identical with Porphyria, or whether Porphyria is another lady friend whom the poet helped to a too realistic immortality. Anyhow, the duel that is recorded in "Before" and "After" probably represents the violent end of this violent passion.

APPROPOS of Mr. Gosse, much honour has just been thrust upon him by the advertisers of Dr. Garnett's Anthology of Literature. In one of the full-page advertisements in a morning paper this week, Mr. Gosse's physiognomy figured twice—once over his own name, and once over Dean Farrar's. It is common knowledge that Mr. Gosse knows everyone, but it will be news that he is prepared to sit for their portraits.

To collectors and admirers of Mr. Phil May's talent and humour, The Phil May Album, which Messrs. Methuen have just issued, will be indispensable. Sometimes the excellence of Mr. May's jokes is not on a level with that of his hand; but in most of the specimens in this engaging book he is doubly funny. There is style in this dialogue between two rusty actors: "Comedian: 'The critic of the Back Alley Chronicle described me as giving a very saponaceous rendering to my part. What does saponaceous mean, dear boy?'" Tragedian (with learned dignity): "Cudgel not thy brains with words higher than thy blooming salary." And this is good: "Visitor: 'I hear you've had the celebrated Mr. Abbey, the artist, staying with you down here.' Proprietor of Old-fashioned Inn: 'Yea, sir; an' he be the laziest man I ever come across. He do nothing but dror and paint all day.'" Mr. Augustus M. Moore contributes an appreciative Introduction to the book.

To the divergent opinions on the subject of the duration of copyright which we have already printed we have a few to add. The questions we submitted to our readers, and by letter to a number of leading writers, were these: Is Perpetual Copyright, as proposed in America and as supported by Sir Walter Besant, feasible and desirable? If not, is the term of copyright proposed by Lord Monkhouse's Bill—viz., the author's life-time with thirty years added—sufficiently long to meet the all-round justice of the case? Mr. Augustus Jessopp writes:

As far as I can see my way, with these short-sighted eyes of mine, I incline to think the German limit [the author's life-time with thirty years added] ample. But I am quite in the dark—obfuscated, in fact. The analogy of "a house, or a mine, or a fishery," seems to be fallacious. A house always wants repairing, &c., or it ceases to be valuable, a mine is profitable so long as you keep working at it, a fishery has to be safeguarded against poachers, &c. These things are what continual labour expended upon them makes them. Moreover, I cannot see on what principle the posterity of a man who may have written, say, Hamlet, or Paradise Lost, or The Coming of the Friars, or other such equally meritorious creations, should be granted a perpetual pension to be paid by unnumbered generations. I have no posterity; therefore I write as an entirely impartial person, with the mood of a Nihilist or Communist at this present moment in the ascendant.

Sir Martin Conway writes:

Seeing that landlords and other owners of property are permitted to hand down from generation to generation, without limit of time, possessions originally only purchased, stolen, squatted on, or otherwise acquired, an author, who creates out of nothing a work of literature or art, should à fortiori possess for himself and his heirs, successors, and assigns, a right over his creation no less limited. The law places an author in a less favourable position than a landlord, because it was enacted for authors by landlords.

Mr. W. H. Mallock writes:

As a matter of equity I agree with what I gather to be Sir Walter Besant's opinion, that copyright ought to be perpetual. So I think ought patents to be, if it were not for the accidental reason that their perpetuity might interfere with independent but better inventions of a similar but superior kind. This objection, however, does not apply to books. I think the successive inheritors or purchasers of copyright should be obliged to register their rights (paying some small fee) under pain of forfeiting them.

Mr. Herbert Thring writes:

The discussion in your paper with regard to perpetual copyright is very interesting to me as secretary to the Society of Authors.

There is one point, however, that seems to have escaped those gentlemen whom you have asked for their opinion.

Mr. Bernard Shaw considers perpetual copyright a piece of rapacious impudence.

Mr. Courtney thinks a book is a national possession, and the other writers seem to think that the public has a certain claim, after a certain date, to the author's property. This point, then, is clear, from the expressed opinions, that literary property belongs either to the author and his descendants, or to the public "after a certain term." If these opinions are carried to their logical conclusion, then the public should reap the benefit financially as well as intellectually.

Non-copyright books should be published subject to State jurisdiction; and when the publisher had received a fair recompense on his outlay, then the public ought to receive the balance.

It appears to me extraordinary that none of your contributors have taken into account the fact that neither the public nor the author's descendants reap the benefit, but the publishers.

Do I understand that it is the general opinion of literary men that the profits arising from the judicious administration of literary property should belong to the publisher, rather than the author's representative or the public?

Two belated replies to our inquiry as to the most interesting books of 1899 have just reached us. Archdeacon Sinclair gives Mr. Kipling's The Day's Work (which, properly speaking, belongs to 1898) and Mr. Trevelyan's Age of Wycliffe. Mr. Bernard Shaw writes: "Apologies for omitting to post you the card about the favourite books of the year. Left it behind in London. My selection was Tolstoy's Resurrection and Kropotkin's Memoirs of a Revolutionist. It is now too late; but I send this as a guarantee of goodwill, if not for publication."

MR. BERNARD SHAW, by the way, has, in the Young Man, been writing optimistically concerning national culture, in spite of the poor state of the drama. In fact, the state of the drama proves nothing. "For example," he says, Shakespeare's theatre was superior to ours. Near Shakespeare's theatre, however, was the bear-pit where Sackerson was baited. Now if Sackerson's audience had left him and come to Shakespeare's Theatre, a very startling decline in the quality of the drama there would have been quite consistent with a still more remarkable advance in the culture of the audience that was once Sackerson's. If the people for whom our managers are now catering are those who formerly either went to cock-fights, sing-songs, "Judge and Jury," the Chamber of Horrors, and the like, or else never went anywhere outside the routine of home and business, then the national gain is great, even though the theatre has ceased to be any place for superior persons like myself. It is now about fifteen years since I last visited a penny gaff in a leading East End thoroughfare. I do not know whether such a thing exists to-day in such a position. I do know that the very silliest compound of stale romance, cant and snobbery, or the coarsest farce to be found at a suburban theatre, is better than the entertainment at that gaff. The truth is, a decline in the quality of the fare at the best commercial theatres may actually be a symptom of progress, if at the same time the lowest forms of entertainment are disappearing.

THE Christmas Catalogue of the Newsagent and Booksellers' Review is a very useful guide to current literature. But it will be prized by many persons as much for its striking cover, which is both a clever design and a very successful example of colour printing.

A BUST of Heinrich Heine, executed at Rome by the Danish sculptor Hasselrüs, will shortly dignify the poet's tomb at Père Lachaise. The identity of the commissioner of the bust remains a mystery, both to the artist and the public, but probability points to the late Empress Elizabeth of Austria. Heine was her favourite poet, and on a former occasion she employed Hasselrüs, through the agency of another, to chisel a full-length statue of him. Hasselrüs had no notion that the work was for the Empress. Long afterwards, however, during a visit to Her Majesty at her magnificent Villa Achilleion, at Corfu, he came across his own statue among a host of others, and thus was the secret revealed.

"O. O." writes in the Sketch: "An American lady has been paying a visit to Mr. Meredith. She was very much impressed by his noble and dignified appearance. 'I had expected to find an old and feeble man, and was warned in advance to make my visit short, and, above all, to try and slip away without putting him to the pain of seeing me out. But he does not look old at all. His eyes are bold and clear, and he has the voice and the laugh of youth. "No wonder," I thought to myself—indeed, I may have said it—"no wonder that he can tell a love-story better than any living author."'"

Bibliographical.

THE publication of a new edition of the Œuvres de Molière, and the presentation of his Festin de Pierre in English, make one reflect upon the extent to which the dramatist and his work have in recent times been popularised in this country. Just twenty years ago the little biographical and critical monograph by Mrs. Oliphant and Mr. Tarver effected a good deal in this direction. Within the last two decades the translation of Molière's plays into English have been tolerably numerous. A volume of selected plays appeared in 1888. Then a version of the comedies, made by Charles Matthews (edited by G. T. Bellamy), was published in the Minerva Library in 1890. Four years later came (from America) a translation, in four volumes, by one Wormeley. In 1895 the late Mr. W. H. Sonley-Johnstone contributed a translation of certain of his comedies to a library of foreign classics. Separate versions of Les Fourberies de Scapin, Les Femmes Savantes, and Les Précieuses Ridicules came out two years ago. The late Henry Morley made a useful selection of plays adapted from or founded on Molière, which was issued in 1883 and again in 1893. The latest of the English dramatists to adapt from Molière was, I should say, Mr. Robert Buchanan, whose "Agnes," founded on "L'École des Femmes," was produced in London in 1885.

I read that Messrs. Dodd, Mead & Co., the American publishers, announce a new edition of Mr. Swinburne's poems, "revised and re-arranged by the author," who may prefix to it a new essay on his work. I have reason to believe that that essay was begun, if not finished, some little time ago. Would the edition be published in England, where Messrs. Chatto & Windus issue all Mr. Swinburne's volumes? I have, I think, suggested before now in this column that the poems of Mr. Swinburne should be made more accessible to the great public by a substantial lowering of their price. Personally I should like to see a liberal selection from the lyrics and sonnets issued in the form of half-a-dozen cheap and handy volumes. This selection would be addressed to the average English reader, and would therefore contain none of the semi-political poems. In my opinion Mr. Swinburne's poetry has yet to be popularised. So far as I can gather, his verse is read but little by the young, and not at all by the middle-aged, save when an occasional fugitive poem attracts them.

The latest to discourse on Tennyson's poetry is Mr. Frederic Harrison, and I suppose the subject will always have attractions for the literary mind. If, however, I might advise the younger students of the bard, it would be to urge them to begin with his earlier rather than with his later critics. I would suggest that they should start with the essays on Tennyson written by Arthur Hallam (recently reprinted by Mr. Le Gallienne), George Brimley, W. Caldwell Roscoe, Charles Kingsley (in his Miscellanies), R. H. Hutton, and J. Hutchinson Stirling. E. C. Tainsh's Studies should be read, because they were more or less "authorised" by the poet. Stedman's Victorian Poets should not be forgotten, and even in Mr Austin's Poetry of the Period there are some suggestive comments. After these have been exhausted, the young student can turn to more recent fare—if he is not already more than satisfied.

A literary gossipier has reminded us that on Saturday last Dr. Samuel Smiles completed his eighty-third year. Though an old man, Dr. Smiles is in the fortunate position of not having outlived his reputation. It is many a long day since his chief literary successes were first made, but all his books have maintained their popularity. No longer ago than December, 1897, Mr. Murray issued cheap uniform editions of Self-Help, Character, Duty, Thrift, Life and Labour, Men of Invention and Discovery, Industrial Biography, Jasmin, Josiah Wedgwood, Thomas Edward, and A Boy's Voyage Round the World. The latest edition of The Huguenots of France bears the date of 1893. One may add that even if Self-Help and its companions had gone out of print, they might have been described as still living in the persons of the many imitations to which they have given birth from time to time.

Messrs. Putnam announce a volume on The Stage as a Career, and I fancy the author will prove to be American. If that be so, the fact will not wholly invalidate his claim to the attention of the English aspirant, who, however, will do well not to neglect native works in the first place. Let those who know the English "boards" be listened to. Mr. Jerome K. Jerome knows them, and has put his recollections on record in a little book called On the Stage and Off. I would recommend this strongly to the stage-struck amateur. It is a "human document." Leading English players gave advice to all and sundry in a volume called The Actor's Art, which might also be consulted with advantage. Mr. Leopold Wagner's Roughing it on the Stage might well be glanced at. Altogether there is a fair measure of accessible literature on a topic which has a great deal too much fascination for the young people of to-day.

The correspondent of the Athenæum who chides Mr. Fisher Unwin for issuing a volume of poems by the late Mathilde Blind, called The Ascent of Man, on the ground that that title had already been used by the late Henry Drummond for a book of lectures, is very wide of the mark. As a matter of fact, Miss Blind's poem came out originally in 1889, while Prof. Drummond's lectures did not appear till 1894.

I note, by the way, that Mr. W. M. Rossetti, in his latest volume (Præ-Raphaelite Letters and Diaries), speaks of his brother Dante Gabriel as having once been described by a cabman as a "harbitrary cove." Was this the cabman who applied the description of "harbitrary gent" to the once-famous "Jacob Omnium," or is one story an offshoot of the other?

We are promised the Reminiscences of the late Mrs. John Drew, the actress, in volume form. Certain recollections of hers were printed recently in an Anglo-American magazine, and they struck me as rather thin and disappointing. They were, however, interestingly illustrated, and perhaps they will be augmented before they are made into a book.

Seven Centuries of Fighting.

A History of the British Army. First Part. To the Close of the Seven Years' War. By the Hon. J. W. Fortescue. 2 vols. (Macmillan & Co. 36s. net.)

THERE are, apparently, Britons who regret that we possess an army. There are others who are sorry that it is now on active service in South Africa. But there are vast numbers who are proud of it and of its mission, and well-disposed to an intelligent understanding of our second line of defence. Hitherto, however, they have not known where to turn for enlightenment. Mr. Fortescue's opening volumes of his History of the British Army, which bring the record down to the close of the Seven Years' War, in 1763, appear, therefore, at a happy moment. A civilian has written a book which every civilian interested in military matters can master with ease and delight and that is likely to be acclaimed by soldiers. It is the first work that systematically traces our military establishment at home and abroad—in peace and in war—from its earliest sources anterior to the Norman Conquest, through century after century, in a plain and regular progression. If it be not the ideal attempt upon the subject, his task is difficult who shall immediately better it. For it has balance, proportion, and perspective, and it is written in clear and sober English.

Mr. Fortescue unfolds a shameful and a glorious story. But the shame seldom sullies the British colours in the field. It sits in the offices of agents and contractors, at the council-tables of Ministers—upon the throne itself. Again and again the fighting man is robbed of his clothing, his food, and his arms by fraud and avarice. When these are unable to destroy him, faction steps in to balk him of victory and strikes up his sword when it might descend once and for all. When faction itself is powerless, mere imbecile ingratitude turns him adrift, to be a plague and a famine to himself and a firebrand to his neighbours.

In Dutch William's days the Treasurer of the Army in Ireland, one Harbord, "contrived to obtain an independent troop of cavalry, for which he drew pay as though it were complete, though the troop in reality consisted of himself, two clerks whom he put down as officers, and a standard which he kept in his bed-room. This was the only corps which was regularly paid." In 1585 the English forces in the Low Countries were penniless, ragged to indecency, and dying of cold and hunger. Leicester wearied the posts with letters pressing for money. But "Elizabeth would not give a farthing." In August, 1702, Marlborough stood, fresh as a pink, within 3,000 yards of Tallard, who lay on dangerous ground, prostrated with desperate marching. The Englishman held the Frenchman in the hollow of his hand. But the Dutch deputies interposed, and Tallard escaped uncrushed. In December, 1697, the House of Commons, on Harley's motion, "resolved that all forces raised since December, 1680, should be disbanded. The arrears of pay due to the Army since April, 1692, amounted to £1,200,000, and the arrears of subsistence to £1,000,000 more. To meet this debt there was £80,000 in tallies, which no one would discount at any price. After struggling hard to obtain £400,000, the Government was fain to accept £50,000 less than that sum for the service of the Army in the ensuing year. The distress in the Army soon became acute. Petitions poured in from the disbanded men for arrears, arrears, arrears." Had not war again broken out in the Low Countries, necessitating the re-employment of every disbanded soldier, what might not have been the just consequences of this infamy? But enough of this side of the medal. There is no need to dwell upon it, for, in spite of every defacement, the annals of our armies are punctuated with glories.

Reserved historian as he is, Mr. Fortescue's pen does ample justice time and again to the peculiar attributes of the British soldier, who has always been pre-eminently a foot soldier. And in this capacity his conduct at Fontenoy is fairly adduced as almost without a parallel. On that field the doomed but immortal battalions formed up under a cross-fire of artillery. Fontenoy thundered on their left, the Redoubt d'Eu on their right. Before them, entrenched over the crest of a long slope, the flower of the French army awaited their coming. Under this flanking fire they "advanced slowly for half-a-mile in perfect order, and marched up to within pistol-shot of the French infantry, to receive their volley before they discharged a shot. They shattered the French battalions to pieces, repulsed three separate attacks of cavalry, halted under a heavy cannonade, retired for some distance, and reformed under a cross-fire, advanced again with both artillery and musketry playing in front and in flanks, made the bravest brigade in the French service recoil, repelled another desperate attack of cavalry, and retired slowly and orderly under a cross-fire almost to the end."

But Mr. Fortescue's book is not a mere bundle of battles. While the typical combats are set forth in sufficient detail to be understandable, and the tangled threads of the campaigns which they render memorable are skilfully unravelled (and this is particularly noticeable in the intricate operations of Marlborough), the chronicle of events is always utilised for the purpose of developing the inner growth of the Army and its relations to the State. Beginning with the "great English principle which forced itself upon the conquering Normans and ultimately upon all Europe"—the principle that all the army, from the poorest spearman to the richest thane, even to the king himself, should fight afoot—he leads us through the Assize of Arms, the Statute of Winchester, and the battles of Falkirk and Crecy, to the practice of the Swiss, the Landsknechts, the Spaniards, and the Swedes, from each of whom in turn we learned priceless lessons. It is this breadth of treatment that gives the book its chief value. Yet, duly subordinated to the larger issue, microscopic and picturesque details are not wanting. They could not, indeed, be entirely omitted by a writer who cites Tristram Shandy as a "supplementary authority" on the campaigns of William the Third.

Of our bowmen it is interesting to learn that their pay in 1341 was 3d. a day, that the price of a superior bow was 1s. 6d., that it was 6 ft. 4 in. in length, and that a sheaf of two dozen arrows cost 1s. 2d. We all remember the arrows that fell thick and blinding as snow upon the crushed chaos of Crecy, but we have forgotten the tragicomical exploit of our archers at Auray. There even our mighty bows and unerring shafts could make no impression upon the iron-clad French, who stood, battle-axe in hand, laughing at the futile shower. But laughter gave place to horrified dismay when the archers, flinging aside their bows, fell headlong upon the scoffers man for man, and wrenching away those insolent axes, cracked French crowns with French weapons. From magnificent brawn we turn to magnificent tailoring, wherein for two hundred years our Army has shone resplendent. We have seen that Elizabeth clothed her troops like scare-crows—let us gratefully note that it was George II. ("who had little capacities for military duties beyond the sphere of a sergeant-major"), who inaugurated the reign of regular uniform, and conscientiously grappled with the problems of facings, head-dresses, and perukes. But it is scant justice to dismiss him thus. For he sniffed powder joyously enough at Oudenarde, where a French shot brought down his charger.

It cannot escape notice that whether we touch upon a button or a battle it is equally difficult to keep the French out of the paragraph. Perhaps the only immortal soldier dealt with in these volumes who was not largely formed in fighting the French is Cromwell. To Cromwell, with many other things, we owe the revival of the vital English tradition. In Mr. Fortescue's words: "It is time to have done with all misconceptions as to the work Cromwell did for the military service of England, for it was summed up in the one word discipline. It was the work, not of a preacher, but of a soldier." He says further that "beyond all doubt the English standing Army from 1646 to 1658 was the finest force in Europe. . . . Such an army will never again be seen in England." This is probably true, for, as he writes again: "It should never be forgotten that military discipline rests at bottom on the broadest and deepest of moral foundations: its ideal is the organised abnegation of self."

Inexorable space compels silence upon the distinctive merits of a host of other famous names. Edward III., the Black Prince, and Henry V., must be mentioned only to be passed by; nor can we linger over the eccentric Peterborough, the brilliant Clive, or the chivalrous Wolfe. But Marlborough's imperative claim to notice is as irresistible as his serene genius. "Regarding him as a general," says Mr. Fortescue, "his fame is assured as one of the great captains of all time; and it would not become a civilian to add a word to the eulogy of great soldiers, who alone can comprehend the full measure of his greatness." Idolised by his men, he was nicknamed "The Old Corporal," as the armies of Napoleon dubbed their head "The Little Corporal." Mr. Fortescue writes of the two "Corporals":

Napoleon, for all his theatrical tricks, had no heart or tenderness in him, and could not bear the intoxication of success. Marlborough never suffered triumph to turn his head, to diminish his generosity towards enemies, to tempt him from the path of sound military practice, or to obscure his unerring insight into the heart of things. . . . "Marlborough," says Wellington, "was remarkable for his cool, clear, steady understanding," and this quality was one which never deserted him. Nevertheless, if there be one attribute which should be chosen as supremely characteristic of the man, it is that which William Pitt selected as the first requisite of a statesman—patience; "patience," as the Duke himself once wrote to Godolphin, "which can overcome all things"; patience which, as may be seen in a hundred passages during the war, was possessed by him in such measure that it appears almost godlike. These are the qualities which mark the sanity of perfect genius, that distinguish a Milton from a Shelley, a Nelson from a Dundonald, and a Marlborough from a Peterborough; and it is in virtue of these, indicating as they do the perfect balance of transcendent ability, that Marlborough takes rank with the mightiest of England's sons, with Shakespeare, with Bacon, and with Newton, as "the greatest statesman and the greatest general that this country or any other country has produced."

It is a far cry from Marlborough to maps, but we must not take leave of these volumes, whose successors will be looked for with interest, without a reference to the plans which illustrate them. Mr. Fortescue is, indeed, doubtful of the utility of the "blocks of red and blue" that represent the position of troops, and thinks "it is always a question whether their facility for misleading does not exceed their utility for guidance." It is sufficient justification for them that, had they been absent, many readers would have put them in on their own account, and that our Uncle Toby, a "supplementary authority," would have perfumed them with nightly tobacco.

Out of the oldē fieldēs, as men sayeth,
Cometh all this new corne from yere to yere;
And out of oldē bookēs in good faithe
Cometh all this new science that men lere.

Classicism in Literature.

The Augustan Ages. By Oliver Elton. (Blackwood & Sons. 5s. net.)

THIS volume forms part of the Periods of European Literature, which are being edited by Prof. Saintsbury. It deals with a by no means easy task in a very clear manner; its arrangement is, perhaps, as good as the design will permit; and it gives evidence of personal study and independent judgment. The period to which he gives the title of the Augustan Age is an irregular period, because its chronology does not coincide in the various countries. Nevertheless there was a period, marked by kindred features and approximately contemporary in all literatures, which is most typically represented by the French Age of Louis XV., regarded by the French themselves as their culminating or Augustan Age. Mr. Elton has accordingly bestowed this name on the entire epoch in all countries. What Mr. Elton has undertaken, in fact, is really to chronicle a movement, passing like a wave over Europe. It is the rise and victorious progress through Europe of the spirit of Classicism, which is recorded in this excellent little volume.

What is or was Classicism? All are agreed upon its results, but hardly two people agree upon its essence. It is with no surprise, therefore, that we find ourselves in dissent from Mr. Elton's definition or description. At the same time, it has more of the truth in it than has been attained by most critics. He describes Classicism as the research for form of structure and of style. But he has the wisdom to qualify this. He sees that the boasted "form" of Classicism is not the highest form; and he tries to explain this by saying that it is form "perfect under the lesser law of definition before the intelligence, if not often under the higher law of free genius and beauty." This is on the right road, but rather vague in expression, and does not touch the root of the matter. The form of Classicism is form imposed from without; while true form is form evolved from within. Mr. Elton himself has a glimpse of this when he sees in the Greeks and Dante "a greater and more organic power of construction." Organic is the very word. Great form unfolds like an organism, like a flower under the shaping of the inward spirit; the form of Classicism is external and put upon it with a chisel, so to speak. Mr. Elton is therefore at fault when he says that Dante and the Greeks "go beyond Classicism on its own lines." They excel it on very different lines, though the austere nakedness of their form may cause a superficial resemblance in the result. But superficial it is, and essentially kin in its method to Shakespeare rather than to Classicism. Classicism, in fact, was an attempt to copy from without what Greek antiquity produced from within. The result was as little classical as possible.

We must also dissent from Mr. Elton when he places Shelley and Shakespeare together as poets who lacked Dantean mastery of form, and in that respect contrasts them disadvantageously with the classicists. It is true of Shelley, but not true of Shakespeare and Spenser (who is also classed with Shelley). Shelley's poetry is really deficient in law—inward law. But Spenser and Shakespeare belong to quite another order. There is more true law in "Macbeth" than in all Boileau. Faults of detailed finish there may be; but the whole thing moves in the grip of a great central majestic law, distributing organic unity to all the parts. This is an altogether different thing from the inorganic and external proportioning which is the aim of the classicists. Nor can we agree that the correctness of French Classicism ranks "only below" the correctness of Dante and the Greeks. It is a wholly other thing, and has no value whatever for any poet who belongs to the great school of Inward Law.

It was natural that Classicism should seek after shaping from without rather than vital shaping from within. For it was born in France, and was (in truth) the result of the sceptical and rationalising spirit showing itself through letters. Cartesianism was the germ of it all; and its natural end in literature was the levelling artificiality of the latter eighteenth century, as its natural end in thought was the Encyclopædists, headed by Voltaire. It affected those who opposed its animating spirit in the domain of thought. Bossuet combated rationalism in the literary panoply of rationalism: he attacked Molière; he would have none of Malebranche; but as a writer he is part and parcel of the movement which produced alike Malebranche and Molière. The spirit and the form of that movement were alike suited to the French genius; and the greatest—because the most consummately and superbly Gallic—of French writers were its outcome. Victor Hugo is a greater poet than Racine, if poetry is allowed to be before all things spiritual and itself a spirit; but he was not so great a Frenchman, nor has the heart of France ever cordially accepted him as it accepts Lamartine and other lesser but more national poets. With Racine, Molière, Boileau, La Fontaine, Bossuet, Bourdaloue, Pascal, and a host of brilliant names in its forefront, French Classicism went forth to conquer the world. It captured Dryden, though not wholly, and attained complete control of England under Pope and Swift. It killed poetry proper in England; but it created a great school of prose, admirable for distinctively prosaic purposes.

It is in dealing with the English writers of the third quarter of the seventeenth century that the difficulties of the chronological method which Mr. Elton has set himself become apparent. In adopting French fashions English literature has always been like a waiting-maid, who dons her mistress's garments when the mistress has cast them off. The appearance of a French literary mode in this country is sure indication that it is out of date in Paris. Accordingly Classicism was not really regnant in England till the seventeenth century was going out. The cavalier lyrists were lineal from Donne, and it would be misleading to regard them as belonging to the "Augustan Ages" in anything but date. "The most splendid of the satires written before 1700 took less from Boileau than from Latin models which Boileau or Elizabethan poets had set the example of using," as Mr. Elton truly says. Dryden, to the last, owed more to Cowley than has been generally recognised. Even the comic playwrights mingled native tradition with their French models; and the typical masters of seventeenth century prose have nothing to do with the new spirit. The Elizabethan tradition died hard. Dryden's "Ode to Mrs. Anne Killigrew" is a splendid proof of this. It was the same in Spain and Italy. Gongora seems to us to have more affinity with Cowley and the metaphysical school than with Classicism; and the same may be said of the Italian Marino—who was, indeed, translated and partly imitated by Crashaw. But ultimately French Classicism conquered both Spain and Italy to the sterilising of their national literatures, while it long laid a frosty hand on the undeveloped literature of Germany. It was a universal triumph; but in England alone (to our thinking) did it produce results sufficient to compensate for its arrest upon the higher founts of inspiration.

Mr. Elton's survey lays little stress upon the Italian and Spanish literature of this period. With regard to German literature he is much fuller. But in the main his book resolves itself into a review of French and English Classicism. This is really better than a hopeless attempt to gird all European literature of the epoch within the compass of a small volume; since undoubtedly to France and England belong the paramount literatures of the time. This survey of the French literature under the reign of Louis XVI. has special interest, since no recent English writer has attempted it; while surveys of our own eighteenth century writers are frequent. Mr. Elton has evidently made good use of such work as M. Brunetière's late History of French Literature. But he uses his own judgment with interesting independence. A good example is his account of Racine.

It is far from echoing the complacent laudations of French critics, yet is eulogistic enough, venturing comparisons between Athalie and the Samson Agonistes of our Puritan poet, which, personally, it is difficult for us to echo. Yet it is good that an English literary historian should err on the side of enthusiastic sympathy. When he exalts the verse of Racine above that of Dryden for its complete avoidance of consonantal clusters, its perpetual liquidity of vowels, he ignores the truth that mere mechanical softness is no merit, that consonants have their legitimate function of strength, and that lines harsh in themselves may be beautiful to an understanding ear, by their harmony with the subject-matter. An age which worships Wagner should know the use of discords in music—nor do they play a less complex and important part in metre. Dryden himself discusses the nervelessness brought about by too many open vowels. Neither can we shut our eyes to the fact that the whole convention of Racine and his fellow-classics is rhetoric rather than poetic. But the student who follows Mr. Elton will not err by disparaging the French classics. And this, we repeat, is as it should be.

A Fairy Suburb.

Bartlett's Life Among Wild Animals in the Zoo. Edited by A. D. Bartlett. (Chapman & Hall. 7s. 6d.)

THE Zoo is a suburb which never connotes Philistinism or dullness. Tired princes and professional men go there to enjoy its air and its sights. Men who meet nowhere else on common ground find themselves contending shoulder to shoulder for the favour of its inhabitants. Poets may demand a boundless contiguity of shade, a jug of wine in the wilderness; yet even they must find the Zoo a more handy and amusing escape from the dailiness of life. The turnstile that admits you to the Zoo registers with its click the shuffling-off of your last care. We complete and compensate ourselves by going down to this happy suburb where are gathered our missing friends: "All sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field; the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas." A distant roar from the lion house, a nameless scream from yonder thicket, a proud antlered head poised in your line of sight—how homely it all is! The importance of going to the Zoo should have its place in every Londoner's map of life.

The book that lies before us is one long effective invitation to visit the great compound in Regent's Park. The late Mr. Bartlett was superintendent of the Zoo for many years. He took supreme charge of its animal life. He was dentist to my lord the Elephant, and physician in ordinary to the Lion. He fostered young rhinoceroses, and pursued runaway bears in the night while St. John's Wood slept. Those who would be acquainted with his life and his activities should study not only this book, but also the notes which his son edited last year under the title Wild Animals in Captivity, to which the present work is supplemental. In these two books the untraveller and over-civilised Londoner may fill his mind with a thousand facts, which in visits to the Zoo he may remember, expand, and often verify. Both books are frankly composed of notes, scraps, jottings, and extracts from papers read by Mr. Bartlett before the Zoological Society. Mr. Bartlett would probably have given his material to the world in much the same form into which it has been thrown by his son, who states that it was not Mr. Bartlett's intention to make his books too serious or wholly scientific. In life Mr. Bartlett was the chief interpreter between the Londoner and the polyglot races under his care; and in these volumes he appears still as the chatty, discursive interpreter. To convey an idea of his matter is easy, for one may open this book at any page and be sure of alighting on something interesting. Take, at random, Mr. Bartlett's notes on Vultures and Birds of Prey. It is absurd to look at the vultures in their petty cages without carrying in one's mind some idea of the vulture in his free life. Mr. Bartlett explains how it is that these terrible birds can gather so swiftly from all parts when a meal awaits them:

Aided by a powerful and wonderful vision, and sailing, without effort, in a circle of great diameter, in a clear, unclouded atmosphere, miles above the earth, this bird's sight, intent and keen, enables it to observe the changed and hurried movements of any others of his species which might be, as they nearly always are, in quest of food, and which in turn may be within sight of many others that again are in view of others still further off, all making towards a spot where food is found. Whenever a movement is made towards the earth by one, the whole flock becomes instantly aware of it, and of the direction taken; thus they concentrate in incalculable strength, in the same manner that thousands of people sometimes arrive on the field on the descent of a balloon in a part of the country that the day before seemed almost uninhabited.

The gliding flight of a great bird like the condor, which often seems to sail for miles without a single motion of its wings, has, of course, been discussed many times. Mr. Bartlett writes:

The most reasonable explanation of this wonderful power is given in the examination of the air-cells that exist throughout the entire structure, not only in the bones, but among the muscles and between the tissues of the skin and feathers; when the bird rises to a great height the atmosphere becomes cold, and as the temperature of the bird's body is much higher than that of the surrounding air the bird fills, or rather inflates, the whole of the air-cells throughout its body by the hot air that has passed into the lungs of the bird before it reaches the chambers formed for its reception; thus the condors become like air-balloons, and float about, requiring only a slight motion of the tail to steer, rudder-like, in any direction. When the bird wishes to rest on the earth its form at once alters, the wings are no longer on full stretch, but, by contracting the muscles of the wings and body, the hot air is expelled, and the bird descends with rather a rapid, but graceful and easy movement of the wings, and alights without appearing to drop heavily to the ground.

It is the frequent visitor to the Zoo who sees "incidents" as well as animals. Such an "incident" is described by Mr. Bartlett in his notes on the Canadian Beaver in the Zoo. A large willow-tree had been blown down in the Gardens, and when its branches had been distributed to a number of grateful animals an interesting experiment was tried:

One of the largest limbs of the tree, upwards of twelve feet long, was firmly fixed in the ground, in the Beaver's enclosure, in a nearly upright position, at about twelve o'clock on Saturday last (October, 1862). The beaver visited the spot soon afterwards, and walking round this large limb, which measured thirty inches circumference, commenced to bite off the bark about twelve inches above the ground, and afterwards to gnaw into the wood itself. The rapid progress was (to all who witnessed it) most astonishing. The animal laboured hard, and appeared to exert his whole strength, leaving off for a few minutes apparently to rest and look upwards, as if to consider which way the tree was to fall. Now and then he left off and went into his pond, which was about three feet from the base of the tree, as if to take a refreshing bath. Again he came out with renewed energy, and with his powerful teeth gouged away all round the trunk. This process continued till about four o'clock, when suddenly he left off and came hastily towards the iron fence, to the surprise of those who were watching his movements. The cause of this interruption was soon explained: he had heard in the distance the sound of the wheelbarrow, which, as usual, is brought daily to his paddock, and from which he was anxiously waiting to receive his supper. Not wishing to disappoint the animal, but, at the same time, regretting that he was thus unexpectedly stopped in his determination to bring down this massive piece of timber, his usual allowance of carrots and bread was given to him; and from this time until half-past five he was engaged in taking his meal and swimming about in his pond. At half-past five, however, he returned to his tree, which by this time was reduced in the centre to about two inches in diameter. To this portion he applied his teeth with great earnestness, and in ten minutes afterwards it fell suddenly with great force upon the ground.

The beaver soon cut up the log into three convenient lengths; "two of these he removed into the pond, and one was used in the under part of his house." We wish we had been there. A sight worth twenty plays in the Strand!

The exact condition of tameness, and the potentialities of wildness, in the animals at the Zoo are matters which are ever present to the mind of the stranger. It appears that animals which have been caught in their habitats and been shipped to London are effectually and permanently tamed by their rough experiences; rarely do they afterwards give trouble. It is different with their offspring born in the Gardens. Mr. Bartlett says:

In most instances the breeding in captivity of wild animals is attended with considerable difficulty and risk; consequently the young are regarded and treated in the most gentle and kind manner—not the slightest thing is done to frighten or annoy them; you look at them, talk to them kindly, pet them, and feed them with the best and most tempting food, and they appear perfectly tame, and fond of being fed and caressed; but only let something strange, trifling in itself, happen; at times the appearance of an umbrella, or anything moving in the bushes, or a boy's kite in the air, and away goes all the tameness at a moment's notice; the creature rushes at the fence, and, if possible, breaks loose by either smashing the fence or leaping over it, and not unfrequently is so injured that it either kills itself or has to be killed. The simple truth is that the wild and vigorous natures of these animals manifest themselves only under the influence of fear. Endless instances in support of this have occurred in this country and on the Continent—in fact, wherever wild animals have been bred in captivity.

Mr. Bartlett's books contain more than natural history. They are the records of one man's relations with animals—relations the most kindly, the most honourable.

Confessions of a Publisher.

Memories. By C. Kegan Paul. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

MR. KEGAN PAUL complains that he has a poor memory; we would call it rather the best kind of memory—the eclectic, which rejects all that is unimportant to the purpose in hand, and retains only that which, though in some respects trivial, is the very mainstay of the raconteur. Chatting pleasantly about his recollections of a long life and his own pilgrimage through Anglicanism and scepticism to the Roman Catholic Church, Mr. Paul never dreams of boring us with the coronation of Queen Victoria or the funeral of the Duke of Wellington. His earliest recollection is of being sent round the breakfast-table by an aged relative who could not move from his chair to see that the spoons had been driven through the lower ends of the eggs that had been consumed, "lest the witches should ride in them." Of such delightful trivialities as these the book is full, and its early chapters give us an admirable, though not entirely pleasant, picture of the life of a small boy in the opening years of the present reign. The preparatory school was a really dreadful place; education was driven in with the cane, and it is wonderful that the boys at Dr. Allen's school at Ilminster learned anything at all, for the ushers were the most ignorant and contemptible of men. And Mrs. Allen!

Mrs. Allen, though still young, was the fattest woman I ever saw, and the hottest. She would go out on frosty days into the garden unbonneted, unshawled, in the hope of getting cool. In her disposition she was hard and coarse. No grain of motherly kindness, no passing gleam of tenderness for the child, victims of her husband's floggings, ever softened the asperities of our life. Her household was ill-conducted, and her servants were profligate and immoral; the food supplied to the boys was bad, we were insufficiently warmed—one small stove in the schoolroom, round which the elder boys clustered, was all the fire we ever came near—and cleanliness was impossible. There was, indeed, a solemn function once a week when our feet were washed in hot water, and Mrs. Allen herself attended to our heads with a small-tooth comb; but for the rest, all that came between head and feet we washed only in the holidays.

And this was a school at which the sons of gentlemen were prepared for Eton! But even Eton in the forties was only just beginning to struggle above the standard of decency and comfort of the Elizabethan age; and sanded floors were the rule in Mr. Paul's dame's house, which was really and truly a dame's house, with Mrs. Holt in charge, and a nebulous Rev. Mr. Holt somewhere in the background. There was, however, fun as well as flogging for little boys. Once the driver of the coach that took Mr. Paul home drew up his horses, in the chill morning, at the request of the passengers, that they might see a man hanged outside Ilchester gaol. The Eton masters of those days were a curious crew—conservative, pompous, and generally incompetent. Bethell, for example, who has been handed down to memory in the couplet:

Didactic, dry, declamatory, dull,
Big Burly Bethell bellows like a bull.

His reading of the Communion service rattled like thunder in the chapel roof, so that some ingenious boy dubbed him Papirius, regardless of the fact that the surname of Papirius Cursor had nothing to do with cursing.

Mr. Paul is, perhaps, at his best in his sketches of rustic life, for his father held a living in the West of England, and he himself served country parishes, both as curate and vicar. Old Dagg, for instance, who earned his living by doing odd jobs—haulage of manure and so on—wanted to marry a fourth wife, but pleaded that he could not pay the fees. The vicar pointed out the unthriftiness of his project. Dagg slapped his thigh with cheerful emphasis, and said: "Suppose we take her out in a load of dung!" Bloxham, a large village near Banbury, of which Mr. Paul took charge in 1852, was a neglected parish:

The wine at the Communion was put on the table in a black bottle, and on one occasion the cork had not been drawn. Mr. Bell, the vicar, turned to the intending communicants as they knelt at the rails, and asked, "Has any lady or gentleman a corkscrew?" The implement having been obtained (I fancy from the public-house opposite, where stimulants were occasionally procured for the aged curate during the sermon), the service proceeded.

But that reverence was not unknown in the 'fifties is proved by the rebuke of Miller, a theological lecturer at New College. A man more acquainted with secular than Biblical English translated the word γαστήρ "stomach." "I think," said Miller, "that 'belly' is perhaps a more solemn word." Many other interesting people Mr. Paul knew at Oxford, among them the author of Guy Livingstone, but we are specially drawn towards Mrs. Chanter, a sister of Kingsley, who wrote a novel, Over the Cliffs, quite unworthy of remembrance, save for one sentence. The heroine "fell over the cliffs" and arrived at the bottom "a tangled mass of hair and brains." We are inquiring at "all the libraries" for Over the Cliffs, at present without success. But it is as a publisher that Mr. Kegan Paul is best known to the public, and as a publisher he has knowledge of many men and things, Browning, George Eliot, Mr. Lang, and Tennyson, who was "a thorough man of business, and our final parting at the end of one of our periods of agreement was that we as publishers, and he as author, took a different view of his pecuniary value." Here is a story which bears on the late Mr. Grant Allen's comparison between the literary man and the crossing-sweeper as a money-maker. At the house of an eminent surgeon, a prince, easily recognisable, asked what a first-rate surgeon makes in his profession.

"Well, sir," said the host, "I should say that about £15,000 a year would be the mark." "What," said the prince, turning to the then acknowledged leader of the English bar, "what does a great barrister make?" "I suppose, sir, £25,000 would hit the mark." Sir John Millais was also present, and he was the third asked. "Possibly, sir, £35,000 a year." "Oh! come, come!" said the questioner. "Well, sir," said Sir John Millais, rather nettled, "as a matter of fact, last year I made £40,000, and might have made more, had I not been taking holiday longer than usual in Scotland." When he had finished speaking Mr. Browning put his arms through Mr. Arnold's and mine, and said, "We don't make that by literature, do we?"

And Mr. Kegan Paul himself thinks that literature is not in itself a profession. With perhaps the exception of Dr. Johnson and Lord Tennyson, it is difficult to name any men who, writing really good works, lived by those works and by the pensions conferred upon them on account of those works. With those exceptions I can think of no one whose books have lived or are likely to live, who have not either had an independent fortune or a profession quite apart from literature by which they have gained at least a decent livelihood. . . . The author who has nothing to fall back upon is in a bad way.

That is rather discouraging to the young man with writing materials and a brain and no private income. It is the more discouraging because Mr. Kegan Paul has selected Dr. Johnson as one of the two literary traders with "half-a-crown in his pocket" who will live. For, so far as books are concerned, it is Boswell, and not Johnson, who lives. Who reads Rasselas? Who can quote London? Who will bet sixpence on the accuracy of the Dictionary? So, with a shade of discontent, we take leave of a book which has given us a couple of happy hours.

AMERICAN LANDS AND LETTERS.

BY DONALD G. MITCHELL.

A book of pleasant, kindly, sunshiny reminiscences of American writers and their haunts: Emerson, Whittier, Thoreau, Greeley, Willis, Poe, and many others pass in familiar procession. Mr. Mitchell writes with a kind of unction which produces rather strained writing in places. He sometimes seems to choose a word because it is curious or unlikely rather than because it is fit. Thus we find Whittier, when he had returned to his old home, "shouldering up the industrial exigencies of the farm." Of Hawthorne's love of England we read: "The ivies of old ruins took him graciously in their clasp, and with such close hug of their abounding tendrils as he did not struggle against." Such tricks of style are too numerous. But the book is readable, and bright with portraits and picturesque views. Of the industry of Bancroft, the historian, we read:

During all these twenty-five years (which would have made a great gap in most lives, but which counted for far less with this veteran, who took smilingly the seventies and eighties that lighted his long career) he toiled at his history; rode jauntily in Rotten-row; made a home in Washington and another—long cherished and loved—upon the cliffs at Newport—where he had a lawn rivaling English lawns—and set his roses to bloom in fairer colours and with more velvety petals than any that opened under the fogs of Twickenham or of Richmond Hill. He loved a beautiful rose as he loved a sure-footed horse, or a rotund trail to his historic periods. . . . Even now, as one of his high, rhetorical, periods slips from tongue and memory, we seem to see that alert figure and good horseman, mounted in soldierly way—trim, erect, and with lifted head, snuffing the breezy air of a November morning, upon the banks of the Potomac or by Georgetown Heights—on his well-groomed horse, with a rose at the lapel of his coat, his eyes keen, his hair frosted with eighty years—riding primly and gallantly away, into that Past which is swallowing us all.

Margaret Fuller's magnetic personality, and its effect on Emerson, are thus described :

She came early under the thrall of Emerson's genius; but there was no electrical concert of forces between them; "the room enlarges when she comes," he says; and the horizon widens under that billowy talk which fascinated so many; but—at her going—a large home content and relief always came to him, with no yearnings for a continuance of the spell. "Such a predetermination," says Carlyle, "to eat this big universe as her oyster I have not before seen in any human soul."

These extracts are typical. By the way, why do not English writers of reminiscences illustrate their books? As a rule they do not; yet the illustrated book of reminiscences is a delightful and a marketable product. (Dent & Co. 7s. 6d.)

GOthic ARCHITECTURE. BY CHARLES HERBERT MOORE.

This is a second edition, though whether the first ever found its way from Massachusetts to England we are not quite sure. In any case, the book has been "almost completely rewritten," and equipped with many new illustrations. It seems to us a most stimulating introduction to the study of which it treats, and particularly valuable because of the stress which Mr. Moore lays upon structure as the basis of all architectural knowledge. In one point he is something of a heretic. He declines to extend the term Gothic to the German and English varieties of pointed architecture, declaring that true Gothic is of French origin, and, with a few exceptions, is to be found in France and France alone. The scope of the book includes, besides architecture proper, the subordinate arts of sculpture and glass staining. The illustrations, from drawings and photographs, are numerous, admirably chosen, and admirably reproduced. (Macmillan.)

Fiction.

Chinatown Stories. By C. B. Fernald.
(Heinemann. 6s.)

MR. FERNALD, like all novelists who describe intimately a new people, has the critic somewhat at a disadvantage. Only half of his work can be rightly estimated: we know that he can write; but we do not know whether or not his psychology is good, because the people are strange to us. We feel, in the present instance, that probably Mr. Fernald has described the Chinese character with extraordinary accuracy. His range is considerable; he begins this volume, for example, with an idyllic story of an adorable Chinese infant, who, dressed in his luxurious prismatic best, wanders out of the San Francisco Chinatown into the house of a beautiful American art student, and has piquant adventures (including a bath) until his father recaptures him. This is sheer good humour and prettiness and colour. And at the end of the book is one of the grimmest and ablest yarns of Chinese piracy and high sea villainy that anyone has written, Stevenson not excluded. In each of these we see the hand of a very capable literary artist. As a specimen of the idyllic manner we might take this:

Then, in the afternoon, and none too soon, he made a grand discovery. It was a knot-hole in the dividing-fence.

He looked upon a place where many flowers were, and the grass grew all of one height, like soldiers. And presently came out Sum Chow's young wife bearing a mat. Behind her trotted a little dame of scarce three summers carrying a fat cloth cat. It was Miss Oo, and the Infant knew she was a girl, because she wore her tiny braids in two little horns that were part of her spangled cap. The Infant saw the mother leave Miss Oo to play alone upon the mat that lay on the grass. These, then, were the women of Sum Chow, who were to be avoided.

Miss Oo sat down and made remarks in her own peculiar language to the fat cloth cat, and emphasised them by shaking it up and down by the tail. Then she rolled over and kicked her infinitesimal feet in the air, and murmured demurely:

"Yai-yai!"

Her eyes travelled along the clear sky until they met the sun. They looked without winking straight into the glittering ball, in solemn satisfaction that it should be there, and for a long time there was no movement in her contented body but the occasional wiggle of a raised and bangled foot cased in a silver-trimmed slipper as big as an ear.

Mr. Fernald's capacity for dealing with a situation of grim tenseness is well illustrated in the following passage. We must explain that Sum Chow, in escaping from prison, comes upon his gaoler, Ok Hut. Chow, raising his weapon, commands Ok Hut to throw up his hands and turn his face to the wall:

But Ok Hut did not obey. He kept his eyes on Chow, debating. Ok had no weapon, but there was one in the drawer of the table where the feeble lamp stood burning; and Sum Chow seemed unarmed, except for the missile which he grasped. Ok Hut waited, planning how to shorten the space between himself and the table, so as to make a dash and get it sooner than Chow could reach him. There was silence but for the snoring of those who slept in the pauper ward. Ok Hut seemed motionless; but he was changing his weight from one foot to another, so that each time he was approaching a fraction of an inch nearer the weapon that lay in the drawer.

That is the way to do it. Something of horror is communicated by this suggestion of imperceptible progress towards the knife. But in this very story one of Mr. Fernald's shortcomings may be discerned: he does not sufficiently enable the reader to visualise the scene. We shall go down to our graves unaware of the precise means by which Dr. Wing Shee helped Sum Chow to escape. The same flaw interferes with our enjoyment of "The Gentleman in the Barrel," one of the least admirable of these tales. But it is none the less a fascinating book.

Notes on Novels.

RESURRECTION.

BY LEO TOLSTOY.

Five more parts of Tolstoy's new story arrive in their paper covers of alternating green and yellow, and their enclosing wrapper and indiarubber band. These parts complete the second volume. Resurrection has so far elicited varied comments. One critic says: "It is as if written by Zola in collaboration with the prophet Isaiah." Another critic says that Tolstoy "lowers his genius to the altitude of a schoolmaster with a ferule in his hand." A third writer begins: "This masterpiece of Count Tolstoy's—the greatest work he has yet done . . ." (Brotherhood Publishing Co. 5d. net.)

TRANSLATED BY

TALES FROM SIENKIEWICZ.

S. C. DE SOISSONS.

Nine short stories by the Slav novelist. The first tells how a strolling musician was promoted to be village organist. "When the mass was at its height, the scent of myrrh, amber, and odoriferous herbs, and the sight of the blazing candles and glittering ostensary seemed to overflow and overpower the worshippers, and the whole congregation fell as if it were lifted into air. Then the canon, raising and lowering the monstrance, closed his eyes in ecstasy. So, too, did Pan Klen at the organ." (Allen. 6s.)

Green Thoughts in Green Shades.

ENGLISH gardens now bear two sets of blossom: flowers to pluck and flowers to read. In this dying year, for instance, garden books have multiplied beneficently. We have had Miss Jekyll's Wood and Garden, a very charming blend of practical counsel and good writing; Mrs. Earle's More Pot-Pourri from a Surrey Garden, a homely medley of floral and culinary lore; another of Dean Hole's monographs, Our Gardens; The Solitary Summer, a very delightful work of garden philosophy, by the anonymous author of Elizabeth and her German Garden; The Century Book of Gardening has begun publication—a mixture of treatises by experts, and of beautiful photographs of the best English gardens from Country Life; and now comes a new edition of Mr. Sieveking's garden anthology.* Altogether, even if we have not omitted anything—and very likely we have—the year 1899 has done well for those that love lawns and shrubberies, roses and trim walks.

Mr. Sieveking's work first made its appearance some fourteen years ago, and was then styled by Mr. Pater "a scholarly little book." It is now a scholarly big book—that is the only difference which would be noticeable in the same critic's appreciation. It is perhaps by way of gratitude to Mr. Pater—his friend and master, as he calls him—that Mr. Sieveking brings his prologue to an end with this distinctly Paterian passage:

And now a last word of egoistic reverie. Where may one indulge in day-dreams if not in a garden? My dream is of a library in a garden! In the very centre of the garden, away from house or cottage, but united to it by a pleached alley or pergola of vines or roses, an octagonal book-tower like Montaigne's rises upon arches forming an arbour of scented shade. Between the bookshelves, windows at every angle, as in Pliny's Villa library, opening upon a broad gallery supported by pillars of "faïence carter's work," around which cluster flowering creepers, follow the course of the sun in its play upon the landscape. "Last stage of all," a glass dome gives gaze upon the stars by night and the clouds by day: "les nuages . . . les nuages qui passent . . . là bas . . . les merveilleux nuages!" And in this ΒΙΒΛΙΟΚΗΠΟΣ—this Garden of Books—Sui et Amicorum, would pass the coloured days and the white nights, "not in quite blank forgetfulness, but in continuous dreaming, only half-veiled by sleep."

Meanwhile, as indication that the dream is not yet fulfilled, Mr. Sieveking dates his prologue from Portman-square. Personally we do not quite share his ambition. Libraries and gardens, we think, should be kept distinct, the plea of the London bookseller (masquerading as an old poet)—

O for a booke and a shadie nooke—being the most we would subscribe to. Even that, however, has its disadvantages. Except in very small doses, books are not for the open air, but for indoors. Maple, as Mr. Wilde once said, is more comfortable than nature.

But all this while we are disregarding the real matter of

* The Praise of Gardens. By Albert Forbes Sieveking. (Dent.)

Mr. Sieveking's erudite and exhaustive work, wherein the praises of the garden are drawn from authors Persian and Syrian, Greek and Roman, French and Italian, early Christian and late Pagan, modern English and modern American. A good idea of Mr. Sieveking's scope will be given when we say that his quotations range from an Egyptian MS. of 1300 B.C. to The Solitary Summer. Most of the later extracts are well known, but the Egyptian and some of the classical passages will be new. This is the Egyptian rhapsody of 1300 B.C.:

She led me, hand in hand, and we went into her garden to converse together.

There she made me taste of excellent honey.

The rushes of the garden were verdant, and all its bushes flourishing.

There were currant trees and cherries redder than the ruby. The ripe peaches of the garden resembled bronze, and the groves had the lustre of the stone nashem.

The menni unshelled like cocoa-nuts they brought to us, its shade was fresh and airy, and soft for the repose of love;

"Come to me," she called unto me,

"and enjoy thyself a day in the room of a young girl who belongs to me, the garden is to-day in its glory;

there is a terrace and a parlour."

(Nashem is green felspar, and menni signifies some fruit now unknown.) This, from Pater's translation of the Seventh Idyll of Theocritus, is very beautiful:

So, I and Eucritus and the fair Amyntichus, turned aside into the house of Phrasidamus, and lay down with delight in beds of sweet tamarisk and fresh cuttings from the vines strewn on the ground. Many poplars and elm-trees were waving over our heads, and not far off the running of the sacred water from the cave of the nymphs warbled to us: in the shimmering branches the sun-burnt grasshoppers were busy with their talk, and from afar the little owl cried softly out of the tangled thorns of the blackberry; the larks were singing and the hedge-birds, and the turtle-dove moaned; the bees flew round and round the fountains, murmuring softly; the scent of late summer and of the fall of the year was everywhere; the pears fell from the trees at our feet, and apples in number rolled down at our sides, and the young plum trees were bent to the earth with the weight of their fruit.

All nations seem to have the garden fervour. One of the most exquisite things in the book is by a Chinese writer (365-427 A.D.):

Lightly, lightly speeds my boat along, my garments fluttering to the gentle breeze. I inquire my route as I go. I grudge the slowness of the dawning day. From afar I desecrate my old home, and joyfully press onwards in my haste. The servants rush forth to meet me; my children cluster at the gate. The place is a wilderness; but there is the old pine tree and my chrysanthemums. Wine is brought in full bottles, and I pour out in brimming cups. I gaze out at my favourite branches. I loll against the window in my new found freedom. I look at the sweet children on my knee.

And now I take my pleasure in my garden. I lean on my staff as I wander about or sit down to rest. I raise my head and contemplate the lovely scene. Clouds rise unwilling from the bottom of the hills; the weary bird seeks its nest again. Shadows vanish, but still I linger round my lonely pine. Home once more! I'll have no friendships to distract me hence. The times are out of joint for me; and what have I to seek from men? In the pure enjoyment of the family circle I will pass my days, cheering my idle hours with lute and book. My husband-men will tell me when spring time is nigh, and when there will be work in the furrowed fields. Thither I shall repair by cart or by boat, through the deep gorge, over the dizzy cliff, trees bursting merrily into leaf, the streamlet swelling from its tiny source. Glad is this renewal of life in due season; but, for me, I rejoice that my journey is over. Ah, how short a time it is that we are here! Why then not set our hearts at rest, ceasing to trouble whether we remain or go? What boots it to wear out the soul with anxious thoughts? I want not wealth; I want not power; heaven is beyond my hopes. Then let me stroll through the bright hours as they pass in my garden among my flowers; or I will mount the hill and sing my song, or weave my verse beside the limpid brook.

Thus will I work out my allotted span, content with appointments of fate, my spirit free from care.

That is almost beyond criticism, and it has a freshness which, in this collection at any rate, does not occur again until a dozen centuries have passed. William Lawson, the "Walton of the Garden" (1570-1608), wrote thus, in his New Orchard and Garden:

And in mine opinion, I could highly commend your Orchard, if eyther thorow it, or hard by it there should runne a pleasant River with silver streames: you might sit in your Mount, and angle a peckled Trout or a sleightie Eele, or some other Fish. Or Moats, whereon you might row with a Boat, and fish with Nets.

Store of Bees in a dry and warme Bee-house, comely made of Firboords, to sing, and sit, and feede upon your flowers and sprouts, make a pleasant noyse and sight. For cleanly and innocent Bees, of all other things, love and become, and thrive in an Orchard. If they thrive (as they must needs if your Gardiner be stillfull, and love them: for they love their friends, and hate none but their Enemies) they will besides the pleasure, yeeld great profit, to pay him his wages. Yea, the increase of twenty Stocks, or Stooles with other fees will keep your Orchard. You need not doubt their stings, for they hurt not, whom they know, and they know their keeper and acquaintance. If you like not to come amongst them, you neede not doubt them: for but neere their store, and in their owne defence, they will not fight, and in that case onely (and who can blame them) they are manly and fight deperately. . . . One chiefe grace that adorne an Orchard I cannot let slippe. A broode of Nightingales, who with their several notes and tunes, with a strong delightfome voyce, out of a weake body, will beare you company night and day. . . . Neither will the Silly Wren be behind in Summer, with her distinct whistle (like a sweet Recorder) to cheere your spirits. The Black-bird and Threstle (for I take it the Thrush sings not, but devoures) sing loudly in a May morning, and delights the Eare much (and you neede not want their company, if you have ripe Cherryes or Berries, and would as gladly as the rest doe you pleasure:) But I had rather want their company than my fruit. What shall I say? 1000 of delights are in an orchard: and sooner shall I be weary, then I can reckon the least part of that pleasure, which one, that hath and loves an orchard may finde therein.

That is a style which, it seems, is no longer to be attained. The Elizabethans invented it and exhausted it. Here is William Morris on the garden:

And now to sum up as to a garden. Large or small, it should look both orderly and rich. It should be well fenced from the outside world. It should by no means imitate either the wilfulness or the wildness of Nature, but should look like a thing never to be seen except near a house. It should, in fact, look like a part of the house. It follows from this that no private pleasure-garden should be very big, and a public garden should be divided and made to look like so many flower-closes in a meadow, or a wood, or amidst the pavement.

It will be a key to right thinking about gardens if you will consider in what kind of places a garden is most desired. In a very beautiful country, especially if it be mountainous, we can do without it well enough; whereas in a flat and dull country we crave after it, and there it is often the very making of the homestead. While in great towns, gardens, both private and public, are positive necessities if the citizens are to live reasonable and healthy lives in body and mind.

And with that word of good sense we end our quotations.

Mr. Sieveking has done his work very well and has made a pleasant book in which to dip. Perused on a long sitting it may somewhat pall, but in such sippings as one of William Lawson's bees might take, it is, on foggy winter nights, most comforting and full of promise of the summer. The illustrations are well chosen and well produced.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

THIS publishing season has not produced anything that may be described as a masterpiece. M. Anatole France has reprinted, in a charmingly illustrated volume, a series of profiles, under the title of Clio. Any age suffices. M. France has but to cast the witchery of his style over it, clothe it in the grace and charm of his temperament, and Bonaparte himself, who closes the series, becomes something as remote, delicate, unfamiliar, and poetical as the profile of the blind singer of "The Iliad," which opens it. But I have small hopes of M. France's next volume of contemporary history. As it develops in the Figaro, it reveals a meagre promise of comparing with the delightful trilogy beginning with the "Orme du Mail" and ending with the "Anneau d'Amethyste." M. Bergeret, transplanted from a morose and hostile town to Paris, is a less distinguished figure; and the chapters relating to the famous "Complot" might have been written by any clever journalist.

One of the pleasantest French novels I have read for a long while is by Marcelle Tinayre, who herself is a very interesting woman, witty and sparkling. She had already published a clever and original novel, called Le Rançon; but Hellé greatly distances this first work. The book is unfortunately named, as many a reader will be warned from opening it, under the wrong impression that it means something pseudo-Greek. Hellé is the name of a young French girl. She tells her tale charmingly, in the first person; and the story has a freshness, a spontaneity, an elevation rare in modern French novels. The girl has been brought up by an eccentric pagan uncle, like the Emperor Julian, an inveterate enemy of the Christian religion. Hellé, in the teeth of national prejudices, is allowed all the freedom of an English girl. She may come or go at will, unchaperoned. She is free to choose her husband when she has fallen in love with him. She is not allowed to have girl-friends, because the pagan uncle decides that all French girls are corrupted and spoiled in convents. So we have the singular figure in a French novel of a heroine who is a young girl; who is brave, intellectual; has initiative and ideas; has, above all, an ideal; can look men straight in the face, and hold her own in liberal converse; who is pure and loyal and upright; and never dreams of marriage until she falls in love. She goes about alone, and is all the better for it; and when her uncle dies she declines to take a chaperon, but continues to receive her friends just as she did while he lived. It is a brave and noble little tale; and if it could only help to bring about a revolution in the bringing-up of French maidens, we may be sure the popular novelists would find less food for their pornographic studies of French society; and the life of luxury, adultery, and vulgar display would have to make way for the triumph of a cleaner period.

"Gyp" continues to produce volumes with amazing facility; but they are all alike, and since she has fallen into politics, and, according to her latest profession of faith at the Haute Cour, is now a professional anti-Semite, she has said good-bye to wit and sparkle. Besides, no decent person can any longer feel the faintest interest in the utterances of a lady who boasts in court that the Baron Christiani's noble "coup de canne" at Auteuil enchanted her. We feel that the "Gyp" who delighted us has passed away, and the lady who has taken her place is unseemly, dull, barely intelligent, and hideously vulgar. Les Femmes du Colonel is not even readable. M. Loubet may sleep on both ears, as the French say. It is not "Gyp" who will rob him of his popularity: quite the contrary, such ferocious nationalists as "Gyp" and Rochefort help us to appreciate the brave and honest man who is the object of their vitriolic hate.

M. Pierre Loti begins to-day in the Figaro a description of his journey in the East. This opening chapter contains some wonderful effects of colours, of words chosen like jewels that scintillate, or that by their mere juxtaposition induce to reverie. M. Loti's art in word-painting is something of an intangible exquisiteness. He needs but barely a dozen lines to bathe the imagination in colour and a strange lovely atmosphere. It is not an art susceptible of analysis; it eludes definition, for it is neither robust nor classical. It is interpenetrated with an exotic charm and made up of impressionist-oddnesses which captivate as much as they surprise. Here is a sentence, fragile, full of grace and sadness, elusive as a fugitive memory:

Here in the old East of tombs, upon the dust of vanished humanities, the mournful feast endures unceasingly; only we forget it as soon as we return toward the north, and it is then a surprise, each time that we go back, to find it ever the same. Ever it shines over those same old gulfs, warm and languid, over those same shores of granite or sand, over those ruins, over that world of dead stones which here retains all the mystery of Biblical races and of mother religions—so much so that in our imaginations of a day it is associated, the mournful feast of colour with the antique sacred legends; and all these things together end by giving us the illusions of stability, of endurance almost without a beginning, not destined to have an end.

Studies in Contemporary Style.

V.—“Literature and Journalism.”

THERE is a commonplace remark as to the difference between journalism and literature. “Oh, yes,” one often hears some wise person say: “it is good journalism; but it is not literature.” If one gave the wise person encouragement, he would disclose his understanding that writings of good style are to be found in books, and to be sought for among the newspapers in vain. Now, there is in this wise person's understanding a certain truth. If one were invited to find a specimen of perfect style within an hour, and had at one's disposal a first-class library and all the newspapers of the day, it is to the library that one would trust. That indicates the extent to which the wise person is a critic as competent as he believes himself to be; and it is not a great extent. It is only reasonable to assume that if we match all the writers of books in all time against the writers in the newspapers of a single day, the supreme merit will be found among the bookmen. In drawing a distinction between journalism and literature, our wise person, however, means much more than this. He means that the books of a single day are in respect of style better than the newspapers of that day. There he is wrong; and the measure of his erroneous understanding is much greater than that of his right one. Most books of a single day are of very bad style, and the style of most newspapers is very good.

Still, it cannot be denied that, whilst the writers of books are much less expert in style than journalists are, the journalists, as a class, have faults which are in a certain respect, by being general in the newspapers, peculiar to themselves. They have certain usages in phrasing which cannot be defended. A representative assortment of those usages may be compiled from the leading article in the Standard of Monday.—

Our troops suddenly found themselves, apparently without warning, assailed by a heavy fire from a number of Boers posted in an impregnable position.

The word number in that sentence recalls an absurd phrase which is constantly to be found in any journal of field sports: “Mr. So-and-So, fishing at Richmond, caught a large number of dace and roach.” Mr. So-and-So did nothing of the kind. Neither he nor anyone else can catch a number, which is a mere abstraction. He caught the fish, and he caught them separately. If the reporter of his feat had said that Mr. So-and-So “caught roach and dace to a large number,” we could not well reprove the reporter, whose locution, though not definitive, would at least have been correct in thought. Similarly, the writer in the Standard would not have been wrong if he had said “Boers to a large number” or “a large body of Boers.” A number is impalpable. The word, therefore, should not be used to denote a material thing.

The force, according to some of the telegrams sent out late on Saturday, did actually succeed in withdrawing.

There we have two errors. Success cannot be qualified by actuality. Itself is actual. The word actually, therefore, was written merely for the sake of sound. The phrase succeed in withdrawing is very bad. If the writer had written that “the force succeeded in the endeavour to withdraw,” he would have been beyond reproach. As his sentence stands it is not less lamentable than that of our friend on the Thames, just alluded to, who, instead of being content with saying that “Mr. So-and-So caught many dace and roach,” must needs write that “Mr. So-and-So succeeded in capturing a large number” of those fish. It is not easy to explain in a few lines the inaccuracy of such a phrase; but perhaps we may find a way. If the sub-editor changed the reporter's phrase to “Mr. So-and-So failed in catching a great number of roach and dace,” the reporter would be shocked. Now, the phrase designed to denote success is as bad as that which would denote failure. If the reporter realises this, he will not write succeeded in followed by any present participle again; and the thought is worth the attention of the leader-writer also.

... The disaster to which General Gatacre refers occurred later on in the course of the march.

That on should not have been written. Later on, from the lips or the pen of an educated man, is as unbecoming as any grosser phrase spoken by a hooligan.

The Basutos and the Kaffirs of the Colonial frontier have been growing very restless of late under the widely-spread reports of Boer successes.

Of late is unnecessary: it is implied in the verb preceding. Growing very restless is a bad phrase. One may grow in restlessness; but what the writer meant to say is that the savages “have been becoming restless.”

A few miles further away, ministers of the Dutch Reformed Church have refused to provide Christian burial for the body of a Loyalist Volunteer.

There is an important distinction between farther and further. Farther denotes increase of distance; further denotes either the development of an argument or an increase of substance. In the latter case, it is used correctly, near the end of his article, by the writer in the Standard himself. “Lord Methuen,” he says, “is waiting for further supplies of stores and ammunition.”

Nothing could be better calculated to check this tendency than the spectacle of some hundreds of unwounded British soldiers sent to Bloemfontein.

As there was no calculation in the matter, the sentence should have begun: “Nothing would be more likely to check this tendency”. The error is akin to that which, in the Reminiscences of Sir Edward Russell, one of the ACADEMY reviewers noted last week. Bulks largely is a bad phrase; better calculated is usually misapplied; and they are commonplace in the newspapers. At the same time, we may take the opportunity to say that locutions much more than a match for them in badness could be found in the “literature” as distinct from the “journalism” of the day.

Stevenson and Hazlitt.

Of the many books which Robert Louis Stevenson planned and discussed with his friends in his correspondence there is none, perhaps, which would have been more valued than the biography of William Hazlitt. Whenever Stevenson refers to Hazlitt, whether in his essay on "Walking Tours" or in his letters, he makes one wish he would say more. This is what he writes to Mr. Hamerton:

I am in treaty with Bentley for a Life of Hazlitt; I hope it will not fall through as I love the subject, and appear to have found a publisher who loves it also. That, I think, makes things more pleasant. You know I am a fervent Hazlittite; I mean regarding him as the English writer who has had the scantiest justice. Besides which, I am anxious to write biography; really, if I understand myself in quest of profit, I think it must be good to live with another man from birth to death. You have tried it, and know.

If the qualification of a biographer is to understand his subject, Stevenson may be said to have been well qualified to write on Hazlitt. Mr. Leslie Stephen has given us a fine critical estimate of Hazlitt the writer, and the late Mr. Ireland's prefatory memoir to his admirable selection from the Essays, with its enforced limitations, is an excellent piece of biographical condensation, but the life of the essayist has yet to be written. The subject has been tried by many others, but no one has quite captured the spirit of Hazlitt. Had the details of Hazlitt's life, with his passionate hates and loves, been told by himself in the manner of his beloved Rousseau he might have produced a book which for interest would have rivalled the Confessions, but failing such a work one must deplore that Stevenson was not encouraged to write on the subject.

An English Novel "à la Française."

To those who are acquainted with "Gyp's" novels and others of that class it will come with a little surprise to meet a novel in English which treads quite gingerly and with considerable restraint over some difficult ground. The story I refer to is The Progress of Pauline Kessler, and, although every character in the book is more or less objectionable by reason of the grossness of the objects pursued, the narrative is not without a certain charm in its mode of recital. The ultimate end sought by nine-tenths of the individuals introduced in the story is not to be mentioned in polite society, and yet the author has been able to use our clumsy English (in one sense only) as neatly as if he was writing in French. The volume is not for the young person, but as an instance where a book can be written in English without being coarse or vulgar in dealing with certain subjects it may be regarded as opening up possibilities for the English novel of the future, although, let me say within parenthesis, it is not to be commended.

Where is "Dickens-Land"?

When first I came to London, I asked myself the question, Where is "Dickens-Land"? The phrase was familiar to me, and as my boyhood had been largely nourished on Dickens, so far as fiction formed a portion of my mental aliment, I desired to see whether the world he depicted had its counterpart in London. I have been sadly disillusioned.

In Notes and Queries just now there is a discussion going on as to Mr. Percy Fitzgerald's Pickwickian Studies. I gather from it that there is a fierce conflict between Dickens-worshippers as to whether Muggleton is Gravesend or Maidstone. It appears to be admitted that Eatonswill is Ipswich; but I have more than "philosophic" doubts even on that point, for there seems to me to be little, if anything, in common between Pickwickian and English geography.

My range of observation at present is confined to London, and neither in the Strand nor in any part of North, South, or East London can I satisfactorily enact on the stage of my own inner consciousness any of the "fearful" and "wonderful" scenes which are described in Nicholas Nickleby, Dombey and Son, and other works of Dickens.

The other day I picked up in a London bookshop a volume entitled A Guide to Dickens-Land. Here at last I hoped to find assistance in exploring an "undiscovered country." In vain! The author could not direct me to the haunts of old Krook, the finder of the missing Jarndyce document, or of Bill Sikes, the murderous burglar, or of Montague Tigg, the gay swindler, or of Captain Cuttle, the persecuted mariner.

Mr. Percy Fitzgerald and his brother-enthusiasts should let "Dickens-Land" alone. The author of Pickwick must live in literature as a creator of "immortal grotesques."

"Paolo and Francesca."

I have been given Paolo and Francesca this Christmas by one who knew that Stephen Phillips was my favourite of living nightingales or Shelley larks. How sweet, how slight, how charming it is.

But where is the tragedy?

An ancient story of sadness—and you end with the belief that all is well.

Young folk—dead! and yet all's well with them. Dear, dear!

Memoirs of the Moment.

THE length of an obituary notice in the daily press is at the mercy of the merest chance. A man who dies when Parliament is sitting, or unexpectedly at an hour when the pages are already prepared for the machine, has a briefer record than that given to a man of less mark who dies with deliberation in an off season. But not even the pre-occupations of war time have deprived the Duke of Westminster's death of a conspicuous record. It is difficult, perhaps, to determine quite in what way his career had a special significance—the very difficulty the onlooker felt in defining precisely the attractions of the spare, ascetic-looking figure, particularly agreeable to those for whom he cared, but stubborn—and, if necessary, pugnacious—when his back was up against a combatant; mild-mannered and even meek of aspect, yet withal a man of will, of prejudice even. He was not only a very frank man, but a very fearless one. When his first wife (who was also his cousin) went into the witness-box on a famous occasion, and said of a servant that she was good enough to send on to a stranger with a good recommendation, but not to a friend, all the daily papers moralised on the selfishness of duchesses. The Duke, however, approved, and the saying may be taken as expressive of the general ethics of life at Grosvenor House and at Eaton Hall, where a certain cousinly exclusiveness lost nearly all its selfishness in its liberating candour.

A DUKE who was also the possessor of millions, who could therefore marry for love on two occasions, but who at the same time was never happier than when he signed appeals to the public in aid of charities—the character was rare and complex enough to present a study of some fascination. That his actions should always pass without criticism was impossible; but it was not always just. When, in disgust of Home Rule, he turned out of Eaton Hall Millais's portrait of Gladstone he did not give it away, he sold it; and there were hints at calculated penuriousness. The accusation had no meaning for him, to whom the money was a detail, but who would not have given to another what he thought worthless to keep for himself. If this falling out between the Duke and the politician was not one of which the sequel was a dramatic kissing again with tears, at any rate neighbourly relations were resumed through the peacemaking intervention of Lady Frederick Cavendish and others. The truth was, the Duke rejoiced in his dukedom. It was the only thing he cared for that any man had ever given him; and his, on the other hand, was the only dukedom Gladstone had created. To none other of his own sex had the Duke any ground for gratitude; and he grew weary as time went on of an estrangement which choked the exercise of a unique sentiment.

Two circumstances attending the Duke's death are worth a note. Having been unfriendly to Reform Bills at home—his one Parliamentary feat when he sat in the Commons for Chester as Lord Grosvenor was an amendment hostile to the Reform proposals of his own party—he did not feel any enthusiasm about the extension of the franchise at Johannesburg. The war worried him; he fretted under our reverses—the more so because his grandson and heir, Lord Belgrave, a very intelligent observer and reporter of passing history, was at Cape Town, on the staff of Sir Alfred Milner. The Duke was too unaffected a man to be easily taken by this pose or that of national self-sufficiency; and his root-distrust of popular clamour allowed him no confidence in the spirit underlying the applause of music-hall congregations. His sense of public and private duty deprived him, at the last, of that which proved to be necessary for his life. At seventy-four he wore his years lightly; and but for pneumonia—to which he had become a subject—he might have lived on. A winter abroad was an almost certain protection, and one which a whole army of his fellows long for, but lack the means to obtain. This man of many millions did not so far satisfy himself by seeking for more than his own land's share of sunshine. It was not that he aspired to deny himself that which others could not have; it was simply that the routine duties of life had become very binding on a man of conscience. A visit to his granddaughter, Lady Shaftesbury, in Dorsetshire, was his compromise. But there his old enemy had a fighting-ground on which he was able to secure an easy victory.

THE new Earl of Tankerville has been a great traveller by sea and land. Spiritual activities, as well as bodily ones, seem to be his, for, while he is popularly held to be an Evangelical of the Moody and Sankey type, who even met his wife at a prayer-meeting where they both sang hymns, he is set down as Lord Bennet in the Catholic Directory, among the list of bearers of courtesy-titles who have joined the ranks of Rome's recruits.

To its special memoir of Mr. Dwight Lyman Moody, the popular American revivalist, who died the other day at Northfield, Massachusetts, the Daily News devotes nearly two columns, as against the not illiberal single column given to the Duke of Westminster. That inequality is the measure of the enthusiasm raised of old in England by Mr. Moody's preaching and praying. His power was entirely that of his sincerity of manner as an exponent of the Gospel. He was not an educated man, yet his triumph as a popular orator who dwarfed John Bright in his audiences was only one more tribute to the acceptability of the message of the Christian minister who speaks from the heart to the heart frankly, not from the head to the head. "The common people heard him gladly" might well be Mr. Moody's epitaph.

By the death of Mr. B. F. C. Costelloe, one of London's innumerable local legislators strives to legislate no more. Those who knew Mr. Costelloe in earlier years, even when he was at Balliol—he was still in the prime of his life when he died—undoubtedly predicted for him a career rather more extended than that which he actually filled. His always ready and generally appropriate sentiments, and the mellow voice in which he gave them expression, seemed qualities likely to carry a man far in the century of the platform. The fact that the platform has declined of late as an influence may have had some effect on Mr. Costelloe's chances; but even at the Bar, for which he seemed born, he made little or no progress—some say because of his want of a sense of proportion as to the importance of things, and others because he allowed himself to be distracted by his daily journalism, by his School Board business, and by his County-Councilloring. What might have been his fate had he entered the arena of Parliament one need not now guess. But a part of the pathos of his early death lies in the fact that those doors at which he had knocked unheeded seven times must at last, had he lived, have opened to receive him. He fought a hopeless fight against Mr. Goschen in Edinburgh; but at Glasgow he had a chance; so he thought he had once in Wiltshire; so also in Chelsea; and twice in St. Pancras, where, at a bye-election lately, he nearly did succeed in securing the seat. His claims on his party for a safe seat could not have been ignored at the next General Election. That thought was an agreeable one to him; and there was no suspicion of Death's intervention until he was told, about a month before his death, that he was the victim of an immediately fatal disease.

MRS. MONEY-COUTTS, who died the other day at Stodham Park, Hants, was the senior by some years of her sister, the Baroness Burdett-Coutts. Dying at the age of ninety-four, she could recall the men and women who frequented her father's house in St. James's-square when George IV. was king. She saw the crowd of servants sent to Albemarle-street to secure a Byron poem on the day of publication; and she was alert, within the last year or two, to the literary achievement of her own son, Mr. F. B. Money-Coutts. Her political memory was equally extended in its range, and she was, perhaps, the last living being who could speak with personal experience of the fact that Disraeli was one of her father's committee-men at a Westminster election in the thirties.

VULGAR he is not. . . . The sure test of vulgarity is that it debases whatever it takes note of. Dickens, on the other hand, cannot touch the commonest, coarsest detail of ignoble life, but at once it gains a certain interest and suggestiveness; it is seen from an unfamiliar point of view; and the mirth excited in us, boisterous as it may be, invariably allies itself with the kindly emotions. It would be easy to quote from jesters of a later day examples of the arid facetiousness which serves only to degrade its topic; neither in Pickwick, nor in any other of its author's volumes, will you come upon any such perversion of the gracious spirit of laughter. A note of the vulgar in drolling is its affectation of superiority; in Dickens we always feel a sympathetic understanding, a recognition of the human through whatever grotesque disguise.

A New Liturgy.

AN illuminating study of Ruskin by a French critic, M. R. de la Sizeranne, has just been translated into English, under the title of Ruskin and the Religion of Beauty (Allen), by the Countess of Galloway. The book contains three essays which appeared first in the Révue des Deux Mondes, and these have also appeared in book form in France. M. Sizeranne writes of Mr. Ruskin under three heads: "His Personality," "His Words," and "His Æsthetic and Social Thought." He is fully inspired by his subject, and with the instinct of an artist, M. Sizeranne begins with a typical and concrete presentation of Ruskin as a teacher.

"Some years ago I was at Florence on the 7th of March, which is the feast of St. Thomas Aquinas. In the cloisters of Santa Maria Novella, greatest of all Dominican churches, are certain frescoes by Taddeo Gaddi and Simone Memmi, representing St. Thomas in triumph surrounded by his consistory of the seven celestial and the seven terrestrial sciences. 'What better day than,' said I, 'to try and attain a sense of his contribution towards the schooling of human thought?' . . . Wishing to be alone, I went as early as nine o'clock, and found the cloister deserted. The freshness of the morning and the monastic calm of the place made it a delicious resort. The grass, ever fading yet ever springing, gleamed green through the old fourteenth-century arches. The sacristan, intent equally on my peace and his own pocket, had closed the door with a wealth of bolts. Long silences followed the occasional clashing of the bells. . . .

For some little time I had been sauntering along that pavement of tombstones, which fringes the Chiostrì Verdi, and I was approaching the Spanish Chapel, when a soft sound, rising and flowing, fell upon my ear, a murmur of words—speaking, reading—as in prayer. Had I been forestalled? Suddenly in the luminous shadow I perceived outlines of girlish forms, youthful with Giottoesque profiles, wearing sailor hats and little white veils, and all carrying bunches of mimosa in their hands. They were clustering together before the 'Triumph of St. Thomas Aquinas,' and one of them was reading:

'Optavi et datus est mihi sensus,
Invocavi et venit in me spiritus sapientiæ,
Et præposui illam regnis et sedibus.'

Then the voice resumed the English text:

'I prayed and the Spirit of Wisdom came upon me. . . . The personal power of Wisdom; the σοφία of Santa Sophia, to whom the first great Christian temple was dedicated. The higher wisdom, governing by her presence, all earthly conduct, and by her teaching, all earthly art, Florence tells you, she obtained only by prayer.'

She read on for some time, passing from eloquent generalisations on the necessity of discipline in human thought to minutest observations on the fingers or the hair of this or that personage in the fresco, noting where they were retouched, studying the attitudes and the draperies, contrasting the calm air and dignity of the figure of Rhetoric with the extravagant gestures of the common people of Florence—'They try to make lips of their fingers,' insanely hoping to 'drag by vociferation whatever they would have out of man and God.'

The audience listened intently, forming face with the precision of a Prussian platoon towards this figure or that, as the small red and gold book directed them. At times the voice rose even to invocation; the muffled strains of an organ sounded from afar, the faint perfumes of flowers were wafted by like incense, and, touched with shafts of sunlight, the golden-tipped mimosas shone like tapers in their midst. I observed that the pilgrims had stationed themselves on the very sepulchral slab of those Spanish Ambassadors who give the chapel its name; and the words they were reading seemed like a tuft of flowers springing from the dust of the past. What then was this book? What this unknown liturgy? Who the priest of this Religion of Beauty? The sacristan, returning a moment, muttered a name—RUSKIN."

Our Weekly Prize Competitions.

Result of No. 14 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of one guinea for the best translation, in similar length, metre, and rhyming scheme, of this poem by Alfred De Musset:

Mes chers amis, quand je mourrai,
Plantez un saule au cimetière:
J'aime son feuillage éploré,
La pâleur m'en est douce et chère,
Et son ombre sera légère
A la terre où je dormirai.

The best of many sent in is this, by Mr. H. A. Webster, 3, John-street, Portobello:

Dear friends, whene'er I come to die,
Plant near my grave a willow tree.
I love its weeping branches nigh;
Its wan, sad leaves are dear to me;
And light, so light, its shade will be Above the earth where I must lie.

Among other versions are these:

Dear comrades, when I come to die,
Set by my tomb a willow tree:
I love those leaves that grieve and sigh,
And their pale plumes are dear to me,
And very light that shade will be Upon the earth where I shall lie.
R. M. W., Chiswick.

When mine among the graves you see,
Set there, my friends, a willow, weeping
Its leaves beloved, and, sweet to me,
Its fountain pale of foliage sweeping.
Then think me glad, and happier sleeping,
To know how light its shadows be.
W. L., Upper Tooting.

Comrades, whensoever I die,
A willow set my grave to keep,
I love its soft, pale livery,
And drooping boughs that seem to weep,
And lightly will its shadow lie
On the ground where I shall sleep.
H. C., Bocking.

When I am dead, dear friends of mine,
Beside my grave a willow place:
I love its weeping leaves, benign
And dear to me its pallid grace,
And lightly will its shadow trace
The couch of earth where I recline.
C. E. H., Richmond.

Friends, when I go at death's behest,
Plant o'er my grave a willow tree;
I love its downward-weeping crest,
Its tender green is sweet to me.
Light shall its shadow ever be Upon the earth wherein I rest.
A. H. W., Westward Ho

Friends, when the grave your friend shall keep,
Go ye, and plant a willow near,
I love the leaves that bend and weep,
I hold their pallor gracious, dear;
Their cradle kind shall rock the bier
Where—earth to earth—I, too, shall sleep.
T. O., Buxted.

Old friends of mine, when I am dead,
And in the churchyard you have laid me,
A willow plant beside my head,
Whose weeping foliage ne'er affrayed me
The tender green I loved shall shade me
Whilst sound I sleep in earth's last bed.
W. E. G. F., Richmond."

Good my friends, when I am dead,
Plant a willow near my grave:
Sweet to me its drooping head,
For its pale, soft leaves I crave;
Lightly shall its shadow wave
O'er the earth that makes my bed.

Prize Competition No. 15 (New Series).

WE offer a prize of a guinea this week to the best set of mottoes to be placed on or over the doors of (a) a dining-room, (b) a music-room, (c) a library, and (d) a bed-room. They should be chosen from English authors and none should exceed two lines in length.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43 Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, January 3. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the first column of p. 772 or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers.

OUR SPECIAL PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

(For particulars see inside page of cover.)

Received this week: Boanerges, Wyvern.

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

THE COURTIER. BY COUNT BALDASSARE CASTIGLIONE.

Said Dr. Johnson: "Manners are best learned at a small Court. You are admitted with great facility to the prince's company, and yet must treat him with much respect. . . . The best book that ever was written upon good breeding, Il Cortegiano, by Castiglione, grew up at the little Court of Urbino, and you should read it." Castiglione's work was done into English by Sir Thomas Hoby in 1561. It is now put forth in the "Tudor Translations" with a scholarly introduction by Prof. Walter Raleigh; and the book has the solidity and grace peculiar to this series. (Nutt. 18s. net.)

FIFTEEN YEARS OF SPORT AND LIFE.

BY W. A. BAILLIE-GROHMAN.

This is the record of sport enjoyed by the author in visits, extending over fifteen years, to the Pacific slope of North America. "Sport such as I enjoyed in the seventies and early eighties is no longer to be obtained—nothing approaching it." Mr. Baillie-Grohman is a connoisseur of antlers, and his book is a mine of facts about the wapiti, the moose, the antelope goat, and other splendid game. Some of the author's photographs, such as "Civilisation's Progress: Collecting the Last Relics of the Bison for Fertiliser Manufactories," and an astonishing photograph of a "Salmon Run in a British Columbia River," are of great interest. Mrs. Baillie-Grohman adds a chapter on the conditions of domestic life on the Slope, with its dependence on Chinese servants, &c. The practical issues of frontier life are touched up throughout the book, which is a matured personal record that will not disappoint readers of the author's earlier works, Tyrol and the Tyrolese, Camps in the Rockies, &c. (Horace Cox. 15s. net.)

WIMBORNE MINSTER AND CHRISTCHURCH PRIORY.

BY THE REV. THOMAS PERKINS.

This new volume in Messrs. Bell's "Cathedral" series gives us descriptions of these two fine Dorsetshire churches—Wimborne Minster and Christchurch Priory. Both houses are beautifully situated, and both have Norman, or partly Norman, naves. As in the other volumes in this really excellent series, there is an abundance of good photographic illustration. (Bell & Sons. 1s. 6d.)

SAINT CECILIA'S HALL.

BY DAVID FRASER HARRIS.

Scotland of the eighteenth century seems to be attracting students. The Rev. H. G. Graham's Social Life of Scotland, re-viewed by us a few months ago, gave much information about the beginning of literary and musical life in Edinburgh; this book amplifies the musical history of the city. A pleasant compilation of biographical and topographical lore, rightly produced and illustrated. (Oliphant.)

MONTHLY STAR MAPS.

BY WALTER B. BLAIRKIE.

This star-atlas is constructed on an admirable plan. In each map half the heavens, as seen from Westminster Bridge, is depicted, together with the river and buildings according as the reader looks up or down the river, which at this point runs due north and south. The pictorial and educative effects are admirable. The time selected for observation is the first of each month, at 10 p.m. (Scottish Provident Institution.)

CHATTERTON.

BY DAVID MASSON.

This biography, originally issued in 1856 as part of a volume of collected essays, is now re-issued by itself after having been for a long time out of print. As in Prof. Masson's life of Milton, the reader will find much local and collateral lore, much patient excavation. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

RICHARD HOLT HUTTON.

BY JOHN HOGBEN.

We are glad to see that a second edition of Mr. Hogben's monograph on the late editor of the Spectator has been called for. In his Preface, Mr. Hogben talks of the question (for it has been made a question) whether Mr. Hutton believed in the Divine birth of Christ, and answers it in the affirmative. (Oliver & Boyd.)

THE ROSE GARDEN OF PERSIA.

BY LOUISA S. COSTELLO.

Persian poetry, in pages adorned with red filigree borders and illuminated titles—the whole very tasteful, and vaguely Persian, to the eye. To this new edition Mr. Joseph Jacob contributes an essay on Persian poetry. Those who wish to know Omar Khayyam and Hafiz in relation to Persian literature, and not as isolated figures, should study this careful and comely little book, where example and commentary abound. Not only Omar, "the Voltaire of Persia," but Sadi, Attar, Khakani, the Moolah of Rûm, and Scheik Feizi are represented. (Gibbings & Co.)

In addition to the above, we have received:
